The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not going to decide that question until the amendment finally comes to a vote.

Mr. STONE. It may be my fault, but the Chair's answer is not clear to me as to my inquiry. The three propositions stated by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Williams] are embraced in one general amendment. If the point of order should be made, as it can be made, against the whole amendment, can it likewise be made against any part of the amendment on a separate vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already decided a number of times that the point of order must go to the entire amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Chair will permit me to call his attention to the RECORD, the Chair has stated that he was of the impression that unanimous consent had been given for the consideration of this amendment in violation of the rules of the Senate. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that on yesterday several requests were made for unanimous consent, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Martin] specifically objected to each one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was in the Chamber at that time. This is the ruling of the Chair, in order to— Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Chair permit me, please, present this? I am not going to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I am appealing to the Chair, because this is a manifest right of the dependence upon the rules of the Senate. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. Martin of Virginia. Mr. President, I object to the unanimous consent the Senator from Mississippi asks. I am not willing to be put on terms in respect to this matter.

Now. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that for an hour or two on yesterday afternoon before adjournment the whole question before the Senate was, whether unanimous consent should be given for the consideration of this amendment, and on every occasion when the request was put Senators specifically objected to giving unanimous consent. The whole controversy arose because unanimous consent was refused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a clear recollection of just what occurred upon yesterday. No Senator raised the question or asked the opinion of the Chair at that time. The Chair had ruled with the belief that there would be an appeal. that we would some time get through with the question. Chair can not change the opinion, when a point of order has been sustained in Committee of the Whole, that that renders it improper and illegal to again introduce it in the Senate except by unanimous consent, and that unanimous consent is to be taken as having been granted when it goes to the extent of having been introduced in the Senate and adopted by the Sen-That is the ground upon which the Chair makes the ruling.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, on several occasions yesterday the Senator from Florida [Mr. Bryan] inquired whether this could be done and no point of order raised, and on each of those occasions some Senator asserted that a point of order would be raised at the proper time. The amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] is in order for the reason that he gave notice that he would reserve the right to offer the amendment, and no point of order has as yet been raised against that particular amendment for 1 cent drop-letter postage; but on every possible occasion the point of order has been made against the amendment that is now presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no pride of opinion: and the Senator from Nebraska may be entirely right. The Chair, however, has ruled for the purpose of bringing the matter to an issue. An appeal from the decision of the Chair will very speedily settle the question. The Chair will not feel the least bit put out at Senators voting against the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, though I think the Chair is wrong in his decision, because so far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] is concerned, it is clearly legislation; but I wish to ask, what has become of that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is pending, if there is no appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if it is in order to ask for a separate vote on that particular amendment? If so, I should like to make a demand for a separate vote upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it was impossible to hear the Senator from North Dakota on this side of the Chamber. Mr. GRONNA. I will try to make myself heard. I was merely making a parliamentary inquiry, I will say to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BRYAN. What was it?
Mr. GRONNA. My inquiry was, whether it was in order to ask for a separate vote on the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, that is in order. There will have to be a vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What the Senator from North Dakota is inquiring about, the Chair assumes, is can there be a vote, first, on the question of "local first and second zones up to 150 miles, 1 cent per pound"? The Senator wants a vote on that, then a vote on the third zone, the fifth zone, and the remaining zones?

No; I do not care to divide the amendment Mr. GRONNA. which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska, but I ask for a separate vote on the whole amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt that that is the amendment now to be voted on.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall ask for a separate vote on the amend-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire by my silence to accept the view that an amendment having been offered which was subject to a point of order, and a vote having been taken upon that amendment, and the Senate subsequently having reconsidered that vote, that the point of order can not still be made; but I shall not enter an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes the Senator from Georgia would do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I shall not. I am sorry I can not accede to the wishes of the Chair. I do not, however, wish it to be understood that there is a unanimous approval of the ruling of the Chair. I desire, Mr. President, to address myself to the merits of the question, unless some other Senator desires to enter an appeal from the decision of the Chair. shall not; but if any other Senator desires to do so I shall yield.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I would like to say a word. A situation such as we are now confronted with might arise at almost any time. Where an amendment objected to in the Committee of the Whole and against which a point of order is raised and sustained by the Chair, and when afterwards the amendment goes to the Senate, possibly at a time when Senators are away or when those who made the point of order are absent, the provision is again put into the bill, as was done in this instance, and when afterwards a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate is properly made, as has been done in this instance, and sustained by a vote of the Senate, this situation will, of course, The contention is to say that some form of implied unanimous consent brought the amendment before the Senate, and that on that account it is no longer subject to a point of order. That seems to me to be clearly an erroneous ruling. It would furnish an opportunity in one way or another, possibly through the fault of absent Senators, but still by a way of doubtful propriety, of injecting into a bill a provision subject to a point of order, and against which there might be a majority of the Senate. I think it would be a bad practice to establish, and I am going to appeal from the ruling of the Chair and let the Senate settle it.

of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum, The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Nelson Norris O'Gorman Ashurst Bankhead Gallinger Sterling Gronna Harding Hitchcock Stone Sutherland Beckham Borah Brady Brandegee Swanson Thomas Thompson Tillman Oliver Overman Page Peindexter Ransdell Bryan Catron Johnson, S. Dak. Townsend Vardaman Johnson, S. Da

The VICE PRESIDENT: Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a moment or two. When the Chair made the ruling he stated that he expected that an appeal would be taken, and in substance expressed the desire that an appeal should be taken. I always dislike to so far disagree with the Chair as to feel obliged to take an appeal from a ruling, and never go that far unless I feel that the ruling is not only erroneous but that its effect might be seriously embarrassing in the future.

Mr. President, where an amendment to a bill is clearly subject to a point of order as being violative of the rules of the Senate. and the point of order is made against it and sustained while the bill is being considered as in Committee of the Whole, and where later, when the bill reaches the Senate proper, and the amendment, through some inadvertence or for some other reason is inserted in the bill by the action of the Senate without a renewal of the point of order being made against it and when later still a motion to reconsider the action taken in that behalf is made and carried by a vote of the Senate, I hold that the parliamentary status of the amendment becomes the same as that which it held before it was agreed to; in other words, that the legislative or parliamentary status which existed before its adoption is reestablished by the motion to reconsider. If any other rule is agreed to, if the judgment of the Chair as announced is approved, it will follow that whenever an amendment, no matter what it is or how objectionable it may be to Senators, finds its way into a measure through processes similar to that which led to the adoption of this amendment in the Senate, every Member of the Senate is thereafter estopped from raising the point of order, even though a motion to reconsider be adopted. You may reconsider, of course, on a proper motion made by one entitled to offer it; but under the ruling of the Chair, when the reconsideration occurs, the right to raise the point of order is gone, for the reason that the Chair holds that the amendment was, in the first instance, brought before the Senate by unanimous consent, and that because of that unanimous consent could not at any later stage be made the subject of a point of order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to make this suggestion to the Senator: It seems reasonable that after the amendment came into the Senate and the Senate accepted it and dealt with it and passed upon it the point of order was forever gone.

Mr. STONE. That is what the Chair ruled.

Mr. BORAH. That is not only what the Chair says, but it seems to me it is founded in reason, and that therefore, as far as the point of order is concerned, the right to consider that has passed. That is a thing that has passed after we have actually taken it up and considered and passed upon it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President

Mr. STONE. I hold, Mr. President, that at any point of the proceedings in cases like this the point of order can be made, except perhaps where the amendment is brought before the Senate by an express unanimous consent of the Senate. Now, it is not even contended that in this case the question of unanimous consent was ever put to the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

Mr. STONE. If there be any such thing as unanimous consent in this case, it is an implied unanimous consent-implied because no one present made the point of order. But when the matter is brought again before the Senate by the motion to reconsider, it takes the exact position it held before the Senate acted upon it. Mr. GRONNA.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. I am through. The Senator can take the

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply wanted to say, in reply to the statement made by the Senator from Idaho, that the Senate has had no opportunity to make any expression as to the amendment which is pending, because it has never been offered until this morning.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say that I am not proposing to offer the point of order if I could. I want the consideration to go on; but I do not think the ruling ought to be sustained, not so much because of its effect in this particular instance but because of its possible future effect in more important matters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the implied consent from the failure to raise the point of order before the vote took place attached itself simply to that vote. There was no formal action by the Senate giving a unanimous consent. It was simply an implied unanimous consent from the failure of anyone present to raise the point, and thus the Senate was enabled to vote upon the merits of the issue. It attached itself to that vote, and to nothing else. When that vote was reconsidered the implied consent was removed also, and the whole subject was again before the Senate.

I want to say that I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not make or press the point of order, and that we may pass on this question. I will not make it myself. I did not appeal from the decision of the Chair, although I did not agree with the Chair, because I do not want the point of order made. But since we must make a record on this subject, I hope the Senate will not establish the rule declaring a unanimous consent upon facts that I do not think constituted a unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when this matter came into the Senate presumably every Senator was in his seat.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no!

Mr. BORAH. That is the presumption, because we were in session. It may be a violent presumption based upon actual practice, but it is not a violent presumption based upon theory that we were all in our seats. This matter was taken up. It was passed upon. It came within the jurisdiction, as it were, of the Senate. The Senate dealt with it, and from that time on it was under the control and jurisdiction of the Senate; and a reconsideration of the matter would not go back to the point of making it vulnerable to a point of order, because it had passed beyond that stage when we disposed of the matter by Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand-I was not in the Chamber when the ruling of the Chair was made—the ruling of the Chair was based upon the proposition that the action of the Senate amounted to a unanimous consent. Now, I ask the Senator from Idaho whether unanimous consent does not mean affirmative action? The very word "consent" means that an affirmative action has been taken.

Mr. BORAH. Well, now—— Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. There is a difference between an assent and a consent. The thing that we deal with in the Senate is the unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the very terminology implies that the Senate has affirmatively acted upon the matter; and that, of course, did not occur here at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not profess to be at all familiar with parliamentary law. I am just using a little common sense in regard to this matter—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what I am undertaking to do. Mr. BORAH. And the two things are not always harmonious. Now, Mr. President, suppose that the Senator were questioning the jurisdiction of a court, and suppose when his case called he should proceed to the hearing of the matter, either upon the merits or upon general demurrer. Could he ever be heard thereafter to say that he had not assented or consented to the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, perhaps not; but the Senator could be heard if the rule of law applicable to that situation were the same as the parliamentary rule applicable to this situation, which the Senators will find in Rule XX, namely:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing—

And so on. Now, under the rule of the Senate the point of order may be made at any stage of the proceedings, and in a court a demurrer can not be interposed at any stage of the proceedings. It must be interposed at a particular stage of the proceedings. Here, however, the Senate has provided other-

The situation seems to be that this amendment was proposed in the Senate. It had been offered in the Committee of the Whole, and had gone out upon a point of order. Therefore it was an original proposition in the Senate, not coming over from the Committee of the Whole, but, so far as this question was concerned, offered for the first time in the Senate. Now, obviously, having been thus offered, it was open to a point of order when it was first offered. No point of order was made. That does not amount to unanimous consent. It simply amounts to an assent on the part of those present that it should be dealt with.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not quite finished my proposi-I shall be only a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the time taken. Mr. SUTHERLAND. The point was not made, but the matter was voted upon and carried. Subsequently, a motion was made to reconsider, and that motion prevailed. Now, as I understand, the ordinary effect of carrying the motion to re-Now, as I consider is that the matter assumes its original position; and originally, of course, it was open to a point of order.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose we had taken up this matter in the Senate as we did, and passed upon it, and reconstructed the amendment, and the vote had been taken, and it had been placed in the bill. after that had been done, it had been finished, and we had gone on to other portions of the bill, and to-morrow or next day or the next day some Senator should say to himself: "Well, I want the next day some Senator should say to himself: "Well, I want to raise a point of order upon that matter which we settled day before yesterday"—could he have done that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; because it would then have passed to final judgment.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But here it has not passed to final judgment.

Mr. BORAH. It passed to final judgment so far as taking it up and considering it in the Senate was concerned. We assumed jurisdiction of it. That had been disposed of. We took charge of it. We passed upon it, and we completed it, and then there was a motion made to reconsider. To reconsider what? To reconsider the amendment; not to reconsider the question of whether or not we could take it up in the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let us take the Senator's own illustration of the court that he gave a moment ago. Here is a case that has been in the court and has passed to judgment, and the judge has granted a new trial. that put the case back in its original position?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it never puts it back where he can question the jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, I am not so certain about that.

Mr. BORAH. I am very certain of it.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator is familiar with the rule that the jurisdiction of the court is always open to question, even when the matter has passed to final judgment, even on appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BORAH. That is the jurisdiction of the subject matter; but the jurisdiction of the person, the right to take hold of him, the consenting to jurisdiction, is not open after the party has consented. Now, this is a subject within the power of the Senate, once jurisdiction is admitted; and it is admitted when we do dispose of it on the merits.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not this a question of jurisdiction of the subject matter?

Mr. BORAH. No, indeed; it is not. I do not think it comes under that rule at all. It is a legislative question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me that it comes under the rule. A reconsideration of this matter has been allowed; and if we are to use the judicial analogy, it is precisely the same as if a new trial had been granted and it is open to every objection that might have been made immediately prior to the beginning of the original trial. Every objection is open that was open originally.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, as I understand, rules are made for the purpose of expediting the orderly conduct of business and not for obstructing it. Upon yesterday, when this matter was moved to reconsideration, it was said that it was in order that it might be determined upon its merits by the Senate. It was reconsidered. Let it be conceded now that that opened the whole matter before the Senate. They come in here again this morning, and the ruling is made that this is one amendment and that it is before the Senate, and without objection. Now, when the matter is considered for a time, it has been proceeded with necessarily by unanimous consent, since nobody is objecting to it; and, that being the case, it seems to me it is too late to raise this question of order.

and that his ruling ought to be sustained.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I believe a mere statement of this question ought to settle it.

In the Committee of the Whole a motion was made to suspend the rules in order that the committee amendment, which was in the nature of general legislation, could be taken up. tion was denied by a majority vote of the Senate. Nothing then was done in the Committee of the Whole. When the bill went to the Senate the following is what took place. I read from the Record, and call Senators' attention to pages 3767 and 3768:

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Save those amendments which have been reserved for a separate vote, the question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.
The amendment was concurred in.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first reserved amendment.

There follows an amendment which has nothing to do with this particular case. Then this appears:

Mr. Smoot. Mr. President, in a letter dated January 30, 1917, to Hon. J. H. Bankhead, chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Postmaster General, in speaking of this matter, makes the following statement—

Then follows a letter in regard to the drop-letter business. Then Mr. Smoot made a short speech on the subject that is now before us. He said in conclusion:

Mr. Smoot. The amendment provides that, I will say to the Senator.
Mr. Norris. I did not so understand.
Mr. Smoot. It provides—"That on and after July 1, 1917, drop letters shall be mailed at the rate of I cent per ounce or fraction thereof, including delivery at letter-carrier and rural free-delivery offices."
That I understand was the point the Senator referred to.
Mr. Norris. Yes; the language does not seem to me to be plain. Suppose the letter were mailed at the office to be delivered out on the rural route; the Senator intends to include that letter?
Mr. Smoot. I am sure the amendment would include it.
Mr. Norris. Suppose the letter were mailed out on a route to be delivered in town at the end of the route; would it include that?
Mr. Smoot. You mean in a drop box?
Mr. Smoot. It would include that, I think.
Mr. Norris. I will say to the Senator that I offered the same amendment last year, but I specifically provided in the amendment when I offered it that it should include those. It seems to me they ought to be included.
Mr. Bryan. This amendment was prepared by the department.

Mr. Bryan. This amendment was prepared by the department. Mr. Norris. Does the Senator from Florida say it would include that?

Mr. Bryan. It would.

Mr. Smoot. It would include it. I was going to say to the Senator that this is the identical language prepared by the Post Office Department to accomplish the purpose the Senator has in view.

Mr. Norris. All right.

Mr. Bryan. Of course, as the Senator from Utah says, the amendment is subject to a point of order. If the Senator will accept an amendment to his amendment, I shall not interpose the point of order.

Mr. Smoot. What amendment does the Senator propose?

Mr. Norris. We can not hear the colloquy over here. I hope the Senators will speak louder.

Mr. Vardaman. I wish the Senators would speak louder.

Mr. Bryan. I propose to insert at the end of the Senator's amendment.

Then follows Mr. BRYAN's amendment, which was as follows:

Then follows Mr. Bryan's amendment, which was as follows:

Provided, That the rate of postage on second-class matter when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall be 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and on and after July 1, 1919, 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof:

And provided further, That nothing contained herein shall affect the free-in-county privilege on second-class matter or the present rate of postage on newspapers, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, or on second-class matter when sent by others than the publisher or news agent.

Mr. Smoot. Of course, if I accept that amendment, I know there will be a point of order raised against it; but I will say this to the Senator: I am perfectly willing the amendment should be accepted, provided we can have it divided and have a vote in the Senate upon both questions.

Mr. Bryan. Does the Senator accept it?

Mr. Smoot. No, Mr. President; I am quite sure if I accepted it a point of order would be made.

Mr. Bryan. The Senator may be just as sure if he does not accept it a point of order will be raised against his amendment.

Mr. Smoot. Then I will accept it, in order that the whole amendment may go to conference; and now, Mr. President, I ask for a division of the amendment.

Mr. Smoot. Then I must accept the amendment, because if I do not it will go out on a point of order and prevent a consideration of the subject in conference.

Mr. Bryan. Let the question be put.

The President, was that a unanimous consent of the Subject in conference.

Now, Mr. President, was that a unanimous consent of the Senate? I say it was not. It was a unanimous consent between Senator BRYAN and Senator SMOOT. It is a mere colloquy be-tween two very able and distinguished Senators. Senator BRYAN agreed with Senator Smoot that if his amendment went on he, Senator BRYAN, would not raise the point of order; Senator Smoot agreed with Senator Bryan that he would accept Senator Bryan's amendment in order to keep Senator Bryan from making a point of order. Accordingly these two distinguished gentlemen made a bargain each with the other that he would not raise the point of order, and thereupon, nobody else raising a point of order, a vote was had.

Now, that brings us to this situation: A vote was had upon this measure, nobody raising a point of order. We have reconsidered that vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What did we vote on? It was agreed to without any objection.

Mr. REED. That is, in fact, a vote.

Mr. REED. Wait until I get through. We reconsidered that action of the Senate on the vote. Where does that bring us? It brings us back to where Senator Bryan and Senator SMOOT were having their colloquy. At any time before the vote was taken in the Senate clearly anybody could have raised the point of order. We are now back at exactly that point. We have reconsidered the vote. In contemplation of law Senator BRYAN and Senator Smoot are still bargaining each with the other that they will not raise the point of order. The vote has not been taken in contemplation of law. Accordingly at this moment anybody can raise the point of order. There is no question about that.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. There are a number of amendments that have been adopted by the Senate in Committee of the Whole to this bill. They have been agreed to in the Senate. They were adopted in the same identical way that this amendment was adopted. Does the Senator from Missouri think that a point of order can be raised upon any of those amendments?

Mr. REED. No; because they are in the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, what point does the Senator make about the extract he has read from the RECORD? That amendment was adopted just like the others. It is the uniform custom when committee amendments are being considered for the Chair to say that they are agreed to without objection.

Mr. REED. I made no point on that.

Mr. BRYAN. Then it was as thoroughly adopted as if the yeas and nays had been taken.

Mr. REED. The adoption has been set aside and for naught held. It no longer is an adoption. I make no point about the way it was adopted. The Chair put the matter in the ordinary way and very properly ruled in the absence of any objection to the contrary that it amounted to a unanimous vote. unanimous vote is set aside, and now the matter is here for action in exactly the same form it was before the vote was taken. No man will deny the proposition that before the vote was actually taken anyone could have raised the point of order.

So far as I am concerned I hope the point of order will not be made. I hope we shall consider the entire question. I should like to vote for 1-cent postage. I should like to vote to raise the postage upon periodicals and magazines. I should like to vote to allow the newspaper postage to stand as it is at present. But it certainly can not be maintained that the vote having been reconsidered, we are not back at the identical point where we were immediately before the vote was taken, and immediately before that vote was taken any Senator was privileged to rise in his place and object to the consideration of the amendment on the ground that it embraced general legislation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I submit that it is too late to raise a point of order, and I had that idea from the ruling of the Chair. I am frank to say that if a vote had come immediately without any debate I should have voted to overrule the decision of the Chair. I now agree with the ruling of the Chair. I do not agree with all the reasons the Chair stated. I think it is competent under the rule to offer an amendment that has been ruled out of order in Committee of the Whole. I do not believe this amendment gets its right to be considered because it was adopted by unanimous consent. It was adopted by the Senate. It has been reconsidered. There must come a time when it is too late to raise the point of order. Does not that time come when the amendment has been adopted? This amendment was adopted. I care not for the reading of the RECORD by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield. Mr. SHIELDS. I should like the Senator to state what particular act the unanimous consent was evidenced by. At what point in this proceeding did that consent take effect and what was the evidence or indication of it?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course the amendment was adopted without objection.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was the vote adopting the amendment? Is that it?

Mr. BRYAN. That, of course, is the theory upon which the Chair ruled.

Mr. SHIELDS. If that vote is set aside, does not that affect everything that went with it-the adoption of the amendment as well as the unanimous consent which was implied in order to authorize the Senate to vote on it?

Mr. BRYAN. That is not the question raised here.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the very question the Senate, I think, would like to hear you on. What is the difference between this and a case that has been tried in court? Objection is not made to evidence, objection is not made to instruction when it is given, but if a new trial is granted is the court forever bound by the errors it committed at first or is the defendant bound by the case because he did not make an objection on the former trial? Does not the granting of a new trial open the whole thing up for proceedings just as it stood in limine?

Mr. BRYAN. I think the illustration of the Senator from Tennessee is a most unfortunate one. He draws an illustration from the practice of the law. I undertake to say that a man does not demur until after he goes ahead and tries the case, and that if a new trial-

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is injecting a new phase. The Senator from Tennessee never made a demurrer in his suggestion that if errors were committed at the trial, because objection was not made on the first trial the party would not be precluded from making them upon the second trial.

stare decisus

Mr. BRYAN. I was proceeding to say that the Senator from Missouri can not make any point out of what he read from the RECORD. The amendment was adopted just exactly as every other amendment on the bill was adopted. As Senators know it is the uniform custom here when committee amendments are read they are agreed to without objection. To say that that was done by unanimous consent, and therefore any Senator at any time before the bill leaves the Senate can raise a point of order and put that amendment out of the bill, is to say that we would never

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator permit me just there?

That was all set aside by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see if it was. What did we reconsider? We reconsidered the vote by which we adopted the amendment; that is all.

Mr. REED. Where did that leave us, then? Mr. BRYAN. That left us with an amend That left us with an amendment adopted by the Senate that the Senate wanted to reconsider.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it left us with an amendment upon which the Senate had acted; it set aside its action, thus leaving the amendment pending, did it not; just where it was before the vote was taken?

Mr. BRYAN. But it must be remembered always that the Senate having adopted the amendment, no point of order can be raised against it again.

Mr. REED. Certainly not; after it was adopted.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, what was the vote taken on? The vote was to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted. Mr. BRYAN.

Mr. REED. When the Senate reconsidered the vote, was not the amendment before the Senate?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, it was before the Senate. Mr. REED. It was subject to debate, was it not?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, it was, Mr. REED. It was subject to any other thing that could have been done to it before it was adopted, because we set the vote aside

Mr. BRYAN. Except that a point of order—— Mr. REED. It was open to further amendment, was it not?

Mr. BRYAN. It is open to further amendment.
Mr. REED. And open, of course, to anything that could have been done to it before we voted.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the very question here. I confess, Mr. President, that my interest in this amendment and my desire to have it considered may cloud my judgment somewhat about it, but I have examined the rule of the Senate, and if there is any provision in the rules that a point of order can be raised at any stage I fail to find it, either in the rules or in the precedents. First, there is no rule. Then there is no rule or decision of the Senate that concedes the right to raise the point of order at any stage of the proceedings. So now it is proposed to lay down a rule of procedure that has not been considered heretofore, and that has not been decided. What ought we to do about that? It seems to me it would save time, it seems to me it would be in the interest of the dispatch of business, to say to gentlemen who want to raise the point of order the time to do it is when the amendment is reached, and if you do not do it then you are foreclosed from any right to raise it thereafter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator. Mr. SUTHERLAND. What construction does the Senator from Florida give to Rule XX, which provides that-

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course that rule must have a reasonable construction. It can not mean after an amendment has been agreed to and adopted. The Senator from Utah will concede that. It must be before the Senate acts upon the proposition before it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is not the rule

Mr. BRYAN. According to a liberal interpretation of that language you could raise a point of order even after an amendment had been adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the amendment has been adopted the proceedings are ended. This says:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings.

When the amendment has been adopted the bill has been passed, the proceedings have been ended, but now the Senate has voted to reconsider; in other words, to grant a retrial of this matter, and the proceedings upon that amendment are

Mr. BRYAN. What does that mean? That the Senate will take a new vote on the proposition desired to be reconsidered, and it can amend it?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is open to further amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senate can amend it.

Mr. SHIELDS. If it is open to one thing it is open to all.

Mr. BRYAN. When you reach an amendment any Senator who proposes to raise a point of order must do it then. Of course, if we apply the strict technical rule of the Senate to this appeal it could not lie. The Chair invited an appeal and nobody appealed. The Senator from Georgia rose and was expressing his dissent from the ruling of the Chair and was going on to debate it. Then the Senator from Missouri finally appealed from the decision. I think under a very strict construction a point of order could be sustained that the appeal came I am not going to raise that. I have become convinced that the ruling of the Chair is right, and I am going to vote to sustain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but I feel at liberty to vote on this proposition, and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I inquire if the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with that Senator. In his absence, and not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA (after having voted in the negative). fer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. Johnson] to the Senator from California [Mr. Works] and will let my vote stand.

I also announce the absence of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate? the yeas are 25 and the nays are 45. So the Senate overrules the decision of the Chair, and the points of order to these amendments are sustained.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris]. I desire to have the Secretary read the amendment in order that the Senate may know what I propose to offer.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HUGHES. Is there any amendment now pending? The VICE PRESIDENT. No amendment is now pending of which the Chair is aware.

Mr. HUGHES. That is what I understood. I merely wanted to get the parliamentary situation straight.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the action of the Senate overruling the decision of the Chair eliminate the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute amendment. I desire that the Secretary shall read it. I hope the Senate will give attention to the reading of the amendment, because I believe that perhaps it will afford a solution of this question, if the Senate will adopt it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

line 15, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the rates of postage on newspapers published weekly and more frequently shall be 1 cent per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the first, second, and third parcel-post zones, and 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the fourth parcel-post zone, and 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth percel pert zones. eighth parcel-post zones.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama if that amendment would not repeal the law which exempts the county papers from the payment of postage within the county?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not. I think it does. Mr. VARDAMAN.

The provision to which the Senator from Mr. BANKHEAD. Mississippi refers is in another part of the bill, and I do not propose to amend that part of the bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the amendment not state that papers shall pay when mailed at the post office for delivery within those zones?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The free-in-county privilege is not affected by this amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me suggest to the Senator from Alabama that his amendment is to take the place in part of the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is it.

Mr. BRYAN. But as the amendment was read from the desk, it comes immediately after the numerals on page 4, line 15, but it ought to come in on page 5, line 4, after the word "thereof."

Mr. SMOOT. But that matter is all out.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, the Senator from Alabama can offer his amendment as an independent and separate amendment, just as he has done, including what the committee has offered down to line 4, on page 5, and then add his amendment. That is what I think the Senator intends to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I intended to add my amendment at the end of the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama a new amendment?
The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a new amendment.

not go on with these discussions. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold the point of order until we can get an exact understanding as to where the amendment comes in and what its effect will be

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my purpose is to expedite the passage of this bill. We might go on discussing rates on second-class matter from now until next December; it is one of the greatest and most difficult questions before us; and, if we want to get through with our work before the 4th of March, we must have some end to this debate, and I employ the point of order, and make it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts can prevent the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, from offering the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order against the amendment

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has not allowed me to present the amendment as I desire to present it.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment has been read from the desk,

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Regular order!

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment was not inserted at the proper place. I desire to say that this amendment only affects newspapers. It has appeared from the discussion in the Senate that the desire of the Senate is not to increase the rate on newspapers beyond the present rate of 1 cent a pound, except where such papers are sent beyond 300 miles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next served amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us dispose of the amendments coming over from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment I desire to offer has reference to page 4 and the subject matter that has been under consideration. The amendment is to come in on page 4, at the end of line 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have not disposed of all the amendments that came from the Committee of the Whole. There is an amendment that came from the Committee of the Whole, reserved by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Kenyon].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to ask the Senator from Massa-chusetts if he will not permit the reading of the amendment I have offered so that it may go into the RECORD?

Mr. TOWNSEND. He can not help it, if the Senator desires to read it himself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will do that if the Secretary is not permitted to do so. I want this amendment to go into the RECORD, and I want the RECORD to show what the purpose of the amend-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Which amendment is that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The one I sent to the Secretary's desk, and against which the point of order was made before it was

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I think the amendment was read at the desk.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The amendment was read.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I will read it again. It has got to go in the RECORD.

Mr. JAMES. It has already been read, and is in the RECORD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been read and is in the RECORD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I am satisfied.

Mr. BRYAN. I think the Chair is mistaken. The Secretary read the amendment of the Senator from Alabama as if it came in on page 4, after line 15. It does not come there, as I was trying to suggest to the Senator from Alabama when the amendment was being read. What the Senator from Alabama is trying to do is to offer the committee amendment as it appears in the bill down to the word "thereof," in line 4, on page 5, and then insert the new matter proposed by him. In order that the amendment may be intelligible it would have to be printed in connection with what precedes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we have spent a great many hours in discussing this question, and I think that the first duty of the Senate is to dispose of the appropriation bills and line 4, page 5, and then read the memorandum sent to the desk by the Senator from Alabama, it will express the amendment as the Senator from Alabama desires to offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary. On page 4, line 15, after the numerals "$32,000,000," it is proposed to insert the following:

"$32,000,000," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That on and after July 1, 1917, drop letters shall be mailed at the rate of 1 cent per ounce or fraction thereof including delivery at letter-carrier and rural free-delivery offices: Provided, That the rate of postage on second-class matter when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agents, shall be 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and on and after July 1, 1919, 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof: Provided further, That the rates of postage on newspapers published weekly and more frequently shall be 1 cent per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the first, second, and third parcel-post zones, and 1½ cents per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the fourth parcel-post zone, and 2 cents per pound or fraction thereof when mailed for delivery within the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth parcel-post zones.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 15, on page 4. I wish to have it go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The entire committee amendment Mr. SMITH of Georgia. now has gone out, and the language I offer is to be inserted in line 15, page 4, after the figures "$32,000,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 15, after the figures "$32,-000,000," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

Words:

Provided, That the rate of postage on second-class matter from and after six months from the passage of this act when sent by the publisher thereof and from the office of the publication, including sample copies, or when sent from a news agency to actual subscribers thereto, or to other news agencies, shall be I cent per pound for the first 200 miles and one-half cent additional per pound for each additional 200 miles. The increased charge beyond 1 cent per pound shall not apply to religious and agricultural magazines and papers or to the publications of the secret or labor organizations except where the same carry more than 20 per cent of their space in advertisements: And provided further, That nothing contained herein shall affect the free-in-county privilege on second-class matter or the present rate of postage on newspapers when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, or on second-class matter when sent by others than the publisher or news agent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I gathered correctly from the reading of the amendment, it provides that a one-half a cent a pound rate shall be charged.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For every 200 miles.
Mr. SMOOT. For every 200 miles beyond the 200-mile limit?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order for the same reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, has the reservation of the amendment known as the Jones amendment been reached yet?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has. We change now from postage to intoxicating liquor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think the amendment introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reen] was not very carefully considered, and I reserved this matter last night in order that a better consideration might be given to it. The fact was called to my attention by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. James] that this amendment, to a certain extent, nullified the decision of the Supreme Court in the late case construing the law regulating the transportation of liquors in commerce. Upon reflection, I believe that it does. I called the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that matter last evening, and he agreed to an amendment which I thought at that time I would offer; but upon reflection I have decided, instead of that, because that would cover but one of the objections, to move to strike from the bill in toto the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, in order that there may be another vote upon the

Mr. President, the act with relation to the shipment of intoxicating liquors prohibited their transportation from one State into another where the liquor was to be received or possessed or used in violation of the State law. The Supreme Court has upheld that proposition. In other words, as the matter now stands the question of liquor, its sale, and its use and its possession is entirely for the States to determine. It seems to me it ought to remain there for the present. That is a good solution of it at this time, until public sentiment may advance further. If a State wants to be bone-dry, that is for the State to determine. If a State wants liquor within its borders for any particular purpose; if a State may not have reached the point, according to public sentiment, where it desires a bonedry law and permits the shipment in of liquor for certain purposes, and at the same time strikes down the saloon-which, in my judgment, is the main object of all this temperance fight in this country-it can now do that.

Under the Reed amendment a State can not be bone-dry that desires to be bone-dry-that is the first proposition-because the exception was ingrafted by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, "except for sacramental, scientific, medicinal, or mechanical purposes." So, in the first place, if a State de-So, in the first place, if a State desires to be bone-dry under this amendment shipments can be made into the State for those four purposes. Congress has taken hold of that subject, and to that extent has nullified the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON.

Mr. KENYON. I do. Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator a question for information. Is there a State in the Union that has enacted laws prohibiting the use of alcohol for scientific purposes?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know. I think not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think that is what "bone-dry" means. I hardly think there is a State in the Union that would be affected by this amendment if it wanted to pass a bone-dry

Mr. KENYON. I am not arguing in favor of any such thing at all. I do not know whether any State has done that or not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there is a State that has prohibited the use of wine for sacramental purposes?

Mr. KENYON. I think not; but I do not know.

Mr. REED. Is there a State that has prohibited the use of alcohol for mechanical purposes?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know.
Mr. REED. If there are no such States, then the amendment which I offered would not bar the use of liquors for those purposes in the State or the shipment of liquor into the State for those purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Not at this time, of course; but if the State did prohibit the use for those purposes, then the amendment of the Senator would permit the shipment into the State for purposes which the State prohibited. That is the principle in-

Mr. REED. If some State hereafter did it.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. REED. I doubt that construction; but we are going a long way when we propose to arrest the forward movement of the car of moral progress and reform, and do it on the ground that somebody, at some time, in some place, may prohibit the use of wine for sacramental purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, I realize how earnest the Senator in hurrying the car of moral reform forward.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask the permission of the Senator from Iowa to make just this statement: I am compelled to leave the Chamber for a few moments; and I want to express my very great desire that the amendment stand as it is. I think it is a good law.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa

yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Iowa seems to assume that an act of Congress could control the legislation of a State. hardly think that is so. If a State sees fit at any time to enact legislation making that State bone-dry, this legislation on the part of Congress could not affect the State's right to enforce legislation of that sort. It will be time enough, then, for Congress to reenact legislation on that subject and prohibit shipment into the State in order to conform to that legislation.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator may be right, and I know that statutes will be construed in pari materia. But because there is some doubt about the matter, I have raised the question that it ought not to be injected into this bill. There is some doubt about the particular question whether or not Congress, by taking hold of this subject to that extent, does not take it away from the States, although I believe the Bankhead bill and the Webb bill can be harmonized.

That is the first point; I am going to discuss this only for a moment.

The second point is this: There are certain States, such as North Carolina and Virginia and possibly others, that permit certain shipments of liquor into the State for personal use. Now, this stops that. I assume that is frankly the purpose of the amendment. I voted for this amendment yesterday believ-ing that it was a proper principle; upon further reflection I fear its adoption at this time will retard the forward movement of the prohibition cause. I believe we ought for the present to let the States determine that matter.

These two propositions that I have advanced are my reasons for moving to strike from the bill, which I now do, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I do not know just where it comes, mechanically, in the bill.

The Secretary. The amendment comes after the word "addressed" on line 16 of the printed amendment, and reads as follows:

Whoever shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, into any State or Territory the laws of which State or Territory prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, shall be punished

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to say a word against this motion to reconsider. Has the motion been amendment from the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the par-liamentary situation. I understand that the reservation of the Jones amendment opened all questions concerning that amend-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair was not here when this matter was disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Was the reservation made?

Mr. KENYON. It was made.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. By whom?
Mr. KENYON. By the Senator from Iowa.
Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia was recognized.

Mr. BECKHAM. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BECKHAM. As I understand, there was a reservation made of all questions upon this amendment. That being true, I wish to make the point of order upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed]. The Senate suspended the rules for the purpose of considering alone the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], which dealt with re-strictions upon the use of the mails for liquor advertisements. Therefore the suspension of the rules permitted only the consideration of that amendment and any amendment to it that was germane to that subject. Now, the Senator from Missouri offers an amendment that is not germane or pertinent, either to the amendment of the Senator from Washington or to the bill itself. The Senate suspended the rules solely for the consideration of the mail question. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment on a subject entirely different, that deals with interstate commerce, and I think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to reply to the Senator from Kentucky. The only amendment that has been reserved in the Senate is the Jones amendment, as I understand.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is wrong. It is the Jones amendment and all amendments thereto—the Bankhead amendment. The Record will show just what was reserved-everything connected with it.

Mr. REED. I do not understand what the Senator from Iowa means by the Bankhead amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Perhaps I should say, the amendment adopted by the committee which was introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] and called the Jones amendment. Mr. BORAH. And all amendments thereto.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, what the Record shows with reference to the reservation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not present at the time the Senate acted upon that matter, but is informed that the reservation was of the Jones amendment as amended in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Jones amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. Now, that brings it in this shape: The Jones amendment was before the Committee of the Whole. It was amended as in Committee of the Whole, and comes to the Senate as amended, and the only way now in which the amendment I offered can be reached is by a motion to strike it out. That motion is now made; and against a motion to strike out a part of an amendment the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Beckham] undertakes to raise the point of order that the thing which is already in, and which there is a motion to strike out, is general legislation

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the effect of the action of the Senate was to engraft the Reed amendment on the Jones amendment, and the waiver of the rules applies to both, and it is properly before the Senate. I am very warmly in favor of the Reed amendment. I wish intoxicating liquors kept out of the State in which I live, except for the purposes permitted by the Reed amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. The Senator speaks about the waiver of the

What does he have reference to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We by vote suspended the rules for the Jones amendment; and the suspension of the rules for the Jones amendment would carry also a suspension, I should suppose, of any legitimate amendment to the Jones amendment. That is my impression. I do not mean to express a final opinion, but it would seem that any perfecting of the Jones amendment or any legitimate amendment to the Jones amendment would be carried also by the suspension of the rules. I do not, how-ever, desire to discuss that. I only wish to say a word about the merits of this amendment.

I understand that our object in making a State dry is really to make it dry; and I do not believe that these bills which permit a certain quantity of liquor to come into the State were passed because their advocates wanted any to come in. The false impression prevailed that under the Webb-Kenyon bill the legislature could not entirely exclude from a State shipments of liquor, and this minimum amount was permitted to come in under the belief that it was essential to the constitutionality of their action. I did not think so. I have thought that they at the time had the right to exclude all shipments. So far as I am concerned I am in favor of prohibition in my State to keep them from drinking, and I am opposed to shipping in quart packages. I am opposed to refusing to allow it to be manufactured in the State and then letting somebody ship it in from another State.

Mr. BECKHAM. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BECKHAM. Has not the State of Georgia or any other State where prohibition exists the right now, and especially since the decision of the Supreme Court on the Webb-Kenyon law, to exclude entirely the shipment of liquor into that State? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BECKHAM. Then let me ask the Senator what is the use of this amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am just going to state it. Mr. BECKHAM. Why not leave it to the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not any doubt when the legislature meets next summer they will amend the present act and exclude it altogether. The subject has been agitated of even calling an extra session to exclude it between now and the 1st of July. The advantage of this provision is that it not only puts the State behind the exclusion but it puts the United States Government also behind the exclusion. It makes it a violation of the criminal statutes of the United States also to ship it in, and as I am desirous to see it excluded I am glad to have both agencies at work keeping it out.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield the floor to the Senator unless the Senator wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. WORKS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the chief virtue of the Reed amendment is that it reaches the man who orders the liquor as well as the railroad companies that ship it in, and I should like to see them both reached by legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is a splendid piece of legislation in the interest of temperance and I hope it will remain in the bill.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I earnestly hope that the Chair will sustain the point of order that I made, and if not, that the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to strike out this provision will prevail.

I voted for this proposition yesterday, as many others did, under a misapprehension, but I am convinced that it is a very serious blow to the cause of prohibition in many States—in the States where it exists to-day and in the States that are to vote upon that subject.

It may be, as the Senator from Georgia says, that his State wants to exclude absolutely the shipment of liquor into that State, and under the law as it stands to-day it can do so; there is no restriction upon it; but it might be that in Virginia or in Indiana or in some other State they would want these limitations. It might be that in some State prohibition would not be practicable and could not be adopted unless some such limitation is permitted.

I believe that the power the States now have since the decision of the Supreme Court on the Webb-Kenyon law is sufficient and ample to deal with this question. If any State desires to absolutely prohibit the shipment of liquor into that State, it can do so now, and there is no reason for Congress to pass any such measure as is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It is not pertinent to the subject under discussion, and it is an entirely different and foreign subject. The Senate suspended the rule solely and specifically for the purpose of considering the restriction of the mails as to liquor advertisements. Here comes an amendment that deals with an entirely different question. I understand the Senator from Iowa made the reservation necessary to allow this point to be made in the Senate. I therefore insist upon that point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a simple statement of the facts in the RECOED will completely answer the point of order. I should like to make it to the Chair so that he may have it

The Jones amendment dealing with the question of prohibition of newspaper advertisements for liquor being sent into dry territory came before the Senate. It was subject to the point of order that it was legislation to an appropriation bill. Thereupon a motion to suspend the rules was made and was carried. Accordingly, the Jones amendment came before the Committee of the Whole for discussion and amendment. During the course of the proceedings it was amended by inserting the language which I offered, and that language became a part of the Jones amendment without objection and without a point of order being made against it. Thereupon the Jones amendment as amended in the Committee of the Whole came before the Senate and is now pending before the Senate. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Kenyon] reserved the Jones amendment. Of course. he reserved the Jones amendment as amended, or else he would not be entitled to make any motion whatever with reference to the amendment to the Jones amendment. If he did not reserve the amendment as amended then his present motion would not lie. If he did reserve it as amended, then he can make the present motion.

But what is the motion and what is the parliamentary situation? The Committee of the Whole sent to the Senate an amendment in a certain shape and form. The Senator from Iowa desires to strike out a part of it. Now, the point of order is made, not that the Senator from Iowa could not move to strike out a part of it but that the very thing he moves to strike out is legislation, although it has already been adopted as legislation and it was rejected in the Committee of the Whole

Mr. BORAH. A parliamentary inquiry. Would a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Reed amendment was adopted be in order at this time?

Mr. REED. Clearly not. I have not the right to answer, but I suggest to the Senator we could not reconsider that vote. We must reconsider the whole general amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Jones amendment, the Chair understands, was clearly in contravention of the rules of the Senate. On motion that rule which was violated was suspended. Then the question before the Senate was the adoption of the Jones amendment. That entire subject matter was before the Senate at the time under that suspension of the rule. It seems to the Chair that the rule was suspended as to any amendment which may have been presented and adopted thereto. For these reasons the Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Beckham] is The Senator from Iowa has moved to strike out not well taken. the Reed amendment, so called, and the present occupant of the chair holds that that motion is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not care to say anything in opposition to the ruling of the Chair, but I want to get, if I can, clearly the parliamentary situation. As I understand it, before we went into the Senate, while we were still in Committee of the Whole, the Senator from Iowa reserved for a separate vote the Jones amendment and all amendments thereto. That included the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Now we are in the Senate. That matter is up. It is just the same. It is a new vote. There is not any such thing as a motion to strike out. Whatever the Senator from Iowa may have said, you can not make a motion now to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, but the parliamentary situation is just the same as it was in the Committee of the Whole. The motion of the Senator from Missouri to amend the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] is before the Senate. It is the pending motion, and the vote is first on the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Missouri. and while that is pending, I take it, the question of the point of order can be raised. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Beck-HAM] raised it. When that is disposed of, either by the point of order or upon its merits, then we come, just as we did in Committee of the Whole, to vote upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I think the Chair beclouded the situation when he said that the Senator from Iowa had moved to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. It true the Senator from Iowa said something of that kind.

Mr. REED. He made that motion.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is such a motion pending, I want to make a point of order against it. The only way to reach it is to take the vote over again, and that is what the Senator from Iowa reserved the right to do, to take over again the vote that we took in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator from Nebraska is in error about the point that the Senator from Iowa reserved-the amendment for a separate vote. He reserved the Jones amendment as amended for a separate vote.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is all he reserved, it would be out of order, in my judgment, now to move to strike out the amendment that was put in by vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has the RECORD before him where the Senator from Iowa made this reservation,

For a separate vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] and all amendments to his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is as I understood the RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. I think possibly my motion was not in order. Then the question would be simply reserving a vote on the Reed amendment. That is all I care about, and that is the parliamentary way to reach it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENYON. That is all I care to say.
Mr. LODGE. This amendment the Senate declared to be in order, and I think that made all germane amendments in order; but, of course, if it is reserved, what is reserved is the whole amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole. It is open to any Senator to move to strike out certain words from that amendment, and that I understand to be the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. if that were true, a motion to strike out a part of it would be a motion in the third degree and out of order on that ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, Whether the Chair was tech nically correct or not, the motion of the Senator from Iowa will reach the same purpose as that of the Senator from Nebraska. It seems to the Chair this is a splitting of hairs. The present occupant of the chair will hold to the ruling just made that the motion of the Senator from Iowa is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment of the Senator from Washington is before the Senate with the Reed amendment attached to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reed amendment is attached to it now. The immediate question is the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the so-called Reed amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I voted for the Reed amendment resterday. I am not going to vote for it to-day. I hope that the friends of temperance legislation will take the same position. I am going to give the reasons for changing my vote. Upon the face of it I am in favor of the amendment as it reads; I am in favor of what it would accomplish; I am in favor of it personally; but we must look a little further than our personal views with reference to matters of this kind. As the Senator from Iowa said, prohibition or temperance legislation must keep pace with public sentiment. The temperance legislation in the State must keep pace with the public sentiment in that State, and it makes no difference what I personally think ought to be done, if the public sentiment of the State will not support it, it will be ineffective.

In my State of Washington we passed a prohibition amendment. It was not a bone-dry proposition. Under it persons could bring in liquor from the outside. Personally I was against that permission. I did not think it ought to be granted; but the people of the State did not look at it in that way. So far as the public sentiment of the State was concerned, it was not far enough along to adopt any other proposition than that. The great and primary object the people of my State wanted to accomplish was to drive out the open saloon. The public senti-ment was strongly in favor of that, and so it voted for this measure. The legislature possibly by this time has passed a bone-dry law. This comes after the existence of this partial prohibition for two years. Public sentiment in the State has gotten so strong as to be back of a proposition of that sort now, and it comes easily and it is coming to stay.

This legislation would not affect the State of Washington. That State has abolished the saloon. The liquor interest is shorn of its power. It can no longer control elections. Its interested supporters are few or none at all. Prohibition is with us to stay. But I have this in mind-this is my fear: There are States that have not yet voted upon the question of prohibition. They are getting ready to do it. What will be the effect if we pass this amendment? It will put in the hands of the opponents of prohibition a strong weapon to fight any kind of prohibition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator. Mr. BORAH. I do not see why that is true. I do not see why that should be used as a club against prohibition. It says:

Whoever shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be fransported in interstate commerce into any State or Territory the laws of which State or Territory prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be punished as aforesaid.

It prohibits the shipment of liquor into a State except for the three or four purposes specified. If the State wants to vote bone-dry on this question, this does not make an exception. do not see how this can interfere; on the other hand, it might help the situation.

Mr. JONES. Here is what I have in mind. I will take a State that is getting ready to vote on prohibition, and that is the State of Kentucky. Public sentiment in the State of Kentucky, the friends of temperance believe, will only support a proposition like we have had in Washington; that is, they will prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State of Kentucky, but will permit the citizens of that State to import a certain amount of liquor a month. This would prevent the people of Kentucky from enacting a law of that character, in the judgment of those who are in a position to know. That is the point I have in mind, and that is what I do not want to aid the liquor interests in doing.

Mr. BORAH. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought the Senator supposed it was impeding prohibition.

Mr. JONES. In other words, I think it will prevent the State of Kentucky from adopting any kind of prohibition. That is what I am afraid of. I do not want to do that. I should like to see the State of Kentucky and every other State not only prevent the manufacture and sale of liquor within the State but its importation. However, the public sentiment of the State may not be that far along.

Mr. REED. Mr. President— Mr. JONES. Just wait a moment until I finish. We have got to fight the battle in a practical way. The enemies of prohibition will use every means in their power to defeat the proposition. They will use every weapon, every instrument, every argument, and every suggestion that they can to influence the vote against prohibition. They will oppose every advance step until it is taken, and then they will profess to stand for that in order to defeat any other step. The liquor interests are for this provision now, not because they want that sort of a law, but in the hope that it will help them beat prohibition.

I do not believe that we ought to adopt any legislation that may play into their hands. In making that statement I do not suggest or have in mind or intimate that the Senators who are favoring this amendment have any such purpose in mind. I do not question their sincerity at all; but I am simply stating my view as to how it looks to me and how the proposition will be used in the future if we enact it now. When it was proposed it met with my approval as a statement of what I am in favor of personally; but as I have thought about it and considered the practical effect of it and the influence that it is likely to have in the progress of this campaign, not in the States where they have already acted, but in the States where they are preparing to act, I believe it is a bad proposition for the temperance cause in a practical way, and that it will do injury to the cause in States where they are hoping to take an advance step. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Idaho. Mr. BORAH. I understand the State of Kentucky, in its prohibition proposition, has an exception which will permit the shipment into the State of Kentucky of a certain amount of liquor for beverage purposes.

Mr. JONES. I do not know what they have proposed yet. I did not know that they had made a distinct proposition. understand that they are preparing for a submission of the question. The Senator from that State can advise us about

Mr. BECKHAM. The question will come before the next session of the general assembly, which meets next winter. It is believed that that legislature will submit an amendment to the constitution to be voted upon, under the constitution, in

I believe, as the Senator from Washington has suggested, that such drastic action as is proposed in this amendment would hurt the prohibition cause in Kentucky, because in practically all the States where prohibition has been adopted there have been made exceptions so that a limited amount could be used each month. It has been found necessary in order to secure the adoption of the amendment and the elimination of the saloon to allow some such exception. I have no doubt when the amendment is proposed by the Kentucky General Assembly some exception of that kind will be provided.

Mr. BORAH. This amendment would not interfere with that proposition. If the State of Kentucky submits the proposition that individuals shall be permitted to ship into the State from outside, say, a gallon a month or any limited amount per month for beverage purposes, this would not cover the subject at all, because they would bring it in for beverage purposes, and therefore it would not be within the purview of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. But this provision does not permit the importation of liquor in interstate commerce for beverage purposes. It only permits it for medicinal, scientific, mechanical, and sacramental purposes

Mr. BORAH. It does not apply at all unless the State has passed a law prohibiting the use of liquors for beverage pur-

Whoever shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce into any State or Territory the laws of which State or Territory prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be punished as aforesald.

Mr. JONES. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that that only says where the State prohibits its manufacture and sale in the State for beverage purposes. The State may pass a law prohibiting its manufacture and sale in the State, but may not prevent a citizen of the State from sending an order outside and bringing it in. I would have no objection to do that, but that is not the general understanding. That is not the understanding of the friends of the amendment or those who proposed it. They propose to say that even though a State, in accordance with its public sentiment, shall go no further than to say that liquor shall not be manufactured or sold in the State, but its citizens may from some manufactory outside of the State bring in a certain limited amount, this shall not be done, and this provision would prevent anything of that sort. That is what they contend, and that is what the provision means.

Mr. BECKHAM. It will override the State law. The State law permits a limited shipment into the State and this act of Congress would absolutely prohibit it.

Mr. BORAH. If the State permitted it to be shipped into the State for beverage purposes the Senator thinks that this would apply?

Mr. BECKHAM. I think it would, because it says even where the State forbids the manufacture or sale in the State and does not make any exceptions.

Mr. BORAH. It could not prohibit anywhere else except within the State.

Mr. BECKHAM. I understand, but when it does that, notwithstanding any exception it might make as to a limited shipment in the State, this act of Congress would forbid such

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have said all I want to say. have given my reasons for voting to-day differently from what I voted yesterday. I hope as far as I am concerned that this amendment will be defeated not because personally I am not in favor of the proposition involved, but because what I fear will be the effect upon the contests in States that are going to try to bring about an advance step in temperance legislation.

Personally, I am for it. The principle is right, but I do not believe it is a wise thing for us to do. If a State wants to take one great step in the direction of full prohibition, let us Let us not lend aid to those who oppose the step. The Webb-Kenyon law fully protects the States in every That law and advance they may take toward prohibition. the States with liquor advertisements shut out of the mails will meet the liquor traffic pretty well until national prohibition is an accomplished fact, as it will be in the near future.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator suppose it is possible that any man in Kentucky would vote to prevent the manufacture of liquor in Kentucky and yet be willing for somebody else to send it in from another State?

Mr. JONES. I simply say that the people of my State did that very thing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those who produce it in Kentucky will not drink it from anywhere else; they do not think it is as good when made anywhere else, I understand.

Mr. JONES. My people voted that way, but after that has been in force two years they are getting ready to do now exactly what the Senator from Georgia and I are in favor of. It may be the law has already been enacted. I saw that a few days ago the lower house of our State legislature passed what we call a dry-bone proposition, and I have no doubt but that it will become a law very soon, if it is not already enacted. That will be done in every State, in my judgment, where they have partial prohibition. This has been the course of the temperance movement. First, local option in a town or township unit, then the county unit, and then the State-wide unit in this qualified way, and then full prohibition. We want results. To get them we must be practical. We must work results. To get them we must be practical. We must work along practical lines to accomplish the ultimate results desired. The defeat of this proposition, in my judgment, is a practical way to secure what it purports to do.

I hope the Reed amendment will be rejected, and I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike it out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment yesterday, and I am going to vote for it again to-day. I would not want to retard the movement for prohibition in Kentucky or elsewhere, but when a State says, "I do not want to drink my own liquor, but I will take some that comes in from the out-side," I think I have a right to exercise my judgment as to what is a sound and wholesome provision. As a legislator, I would not want to indorse that proposition.

This would not apply to Kentucky at all if Kentucky made an exception by which liquors could be sold within the State in small quantities, a gallon a month or something of that kind for somebody to use, because it does not apply in a State where it is in use for beverage purposes. I can not conceive of a man wanting to vote for prohibition complete and absolute in his State, and yet not be willing to vote for prohibition complete and absolute against liquor coming into the State. I think the friends of this matter perhaps have been disturbed a little by the source of the amendment. There is no reflection upon the Senator. It does not disturb me.

Mr. REED. The Senator is a better judge of human nature and character perhaps than the others.

Mr. BORAH. At any rate, it seems to me that there is expressed a proper principle in regard to the matter, and I shall vote in favor of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I very much regret that I am constrained to vote against the motion made by my colleague [Mr. Kenyon]. My only objection to this amendment is that it does not go far enough. I have for a long time been a proponent of the idea that we ought to forbid absolutely all transportation in intoxicating liquor from one State to another, leaving each State to manufacture and dispose of its intoxicating liquor according to the policy of that State. There would be no denial of any worthy object either in a sacramental or medicinal or mechanical or scientific way, for each State could manufacture all of the alcohol that was desirable for those purposes within its own borders.

I think the most effective thing that Congress could do would be to interdict completely all transportation in intoxicating liquor as between the States, and I was very sorry when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed] modified his amendment yes terday by inserting the words "medicinal, scientific, sacramental, and mechanical." To me it is inconceivable that the prohibition cause can be hurt by condemning the policy of any State that will say that "there shall be no intoxicating liquor manufactured in this State, but our people are at liberty to receive such liquor if brought in from other States."

The only reason that this question has ever arisen in any of the States is because it has been assumed that Congress had not the power to prohibit the transportation of liquor from one State to another. That erroneous opinion has been overthrown, and it is now well recognized that we have the power to make liquor contraband, so far as its transportation from one State to another is concerned. I am in favor of doing it, and I again say that I am sorry the amendment excepted the transportation for the purposes indicated in it, namely, medicinal, sacramental, mechanical, and scientific. I am therefore impelled to vote, as did yesterday, for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment yesterday, and I was very much gratified that it was adopted. I shall vote for it again to-day. I do not believe that it will injure the prohibition fight in any State. The opponents of prohibition in the State fights usually say, "What is the use of stopping the manufacture and sale in the State? They will The State ship it in in great quantities from other States." that permits a limited quantity to be shipped to its citizens is laughed at for forbidding the manufacture and sale in the State and yet permitting it to be shipped in from other States.

I think this will be a great help to the "dry" States, and I think it will help States to go "dry." The fact that when States go "dry" liquor is not to be poured in from other States in any way will be a wonderful help to the cause. I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I should like to offer to this bill just now. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair).

The present occupant of the chair thinks the amendment would not be in order at this particular juncture. The Senator from New Jersey will be recognized for the purpose of offering the amendment later.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well.
Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sorry that the author of the Jones amendment, having made his speech, has retired from the Chamber, because what I have to say I think he ought to hear.

Let us see what the subject matter with which we are dealing Let us just for a moment review the situation. What is it The Webb-Kenyon law was enacted, which conferred upon the States the right to prohibit the shipment of liquor from points outside a State into a State. All doubt as to the constitutionality of that law is now at rest by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the West Virginia cases. So, as the case now stands, any State may stop the shipment of liquor into the State if it desires so to do. With the law in that shape, with the full right and power existing in any State to stop the shipment of liquor into the State, the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] brings here an amendment to this bill proposing to send the editor of a newspaper to the penitentiary, as he had it in the amendment, for as long as five years if he shall publish an advertisement of liquor and shall put his newspaper into the mails and send it into a dry State.

What was the purpose, my brother Jones, in asking that amendment except to invoke the aid of the Federal Government to prevent knowledge of where liquor could be purchased outside of your State, and other prohibition States, from even reaching the minds of the inhabitants of prohibition States? That was the object; that was the purpose. There could be no other object or purpose. You propose to send to the penitentiary a man who has simply told a citizen of a "dry where he can get liquor outside of the State; and now when I ask that you reach the shipment itself, you, who stand here clamoring for a law to send to the penitentiary a man who furnishes information as to where the liquor can be purchased, decline to pass a law that will penalize the man who conspires to bring the liquor itself into your State, and you say that I am not acting in good faith. Mr. JONES. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. You say it by intimation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have been very careful to be as considerate as possible; much more considerate toward the Senator than he has been to friends on this side. suggested or intimated that he has been acting with improper motives. I have all the time assumed, and I have tried to debate the question all the time, from the standpoint that the Senator is perfectly honest and sincere.

Mr. REED. I am glad to have that conceded. I waive that point and lift the question entirely above personalities.

You say that it will injure the cause of temperance, the advance of the prohibition movement, to stop the sending of the liquor itself into "dry" territory, and yet in the same breath you ask to send men to the penitentiary for sending information as to where the liquor can be obtained. If there is any mind contained within the skull of any human being that can reconcile those two positions and reduce them to a logical coordination, then I have not discovered the possessor of that remarkable

You say that extreme legislation may deter the advance of this movement. I think that extreme and outrageous legislation will deter the advance of any movement to which the legislation is attached. I said that on yesterday when it was proposed to enact a law that, as it was brought here by the distinguished Senator from Washington, would have made it possible to have sent a woman to the penitentiary for five years who mailed a newspaper to her husband if that newspaper happened to have a liquor advertisement in it, and she knew it. I appealed then for a mitigation of the penalty and a change of that phraseology, and suggested an amendment which, at least, limited the operation of the law to a newspaper publisher who might knowingly send the paper into "dry" territory, and to the dealer in liquor who might be sending it into "dry" territory for the purpose of making money.
So it does not lie in the mouths of those who advocate this extreme legislation against the dissemination of information as to where and how liquor can be purchased to criticize those, or to challenge the motives of those, who say that we ought to go to the evil itself and prohibit the shipment of the thing for the promotion of which shipment the advertisement has been printed. So much for that.

The statement has been made here that we must not run in advance of public sentiment, and that therefore prohibition legislation ought to follow a sentiment that has been created in favor of it in a particular State. Well, there is much in that argument, but it has no application here. Yet I can not refrain from calling attention to the fact that the very men who are now opposing this amendment and seeking to strike it out are the gentlemen who have been the advocates of nation-wide prohibition and who have proposed to employ the votes of the "dry" States to force prohibition upon the great populous States where prohibition has never been adopted. Consistency is a jewel that is not always found in the caskets of my friends.

It is said that this legislation will make prohibition a fact, and that because it will make it a fact it will be difficult to pass prohibitory laws in some States. This legislation simply proposes to stop the shipment of liquor into a State where the State itself has gone "dry"; and the amount of the argument is this, that unless the inhabitants of a State are permitted to irrigate the State from outside sources they will not adopt prohibition. The same argument carried to its legitimate conclusion would lead to the repeal of the Webb-Kenyon law, for the same class of advocates could well say to those who are about to adopt a prohibitory law in a State, "You should not adopt it, for the State will have the authority to stop your getting any from the Therefore we ought to repeal the Webb-Kenyon law, so as to offer the inducement to gentlemen in "wet" States to help adopt prohibition by holding before them the glorious array of quarts and gallons and hogsheads that they may import for their private use. The argument made against this amendment can be made with the same force and effect against the Webb-Kenyon law and in favor of its repeal, because the basis of the complaint is that it will shut off the outside supply of liquor, and that is embraced in the Webb-Kenyon law in principle just as it is embraced in this amendment.

I have always understood the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Beckham], and I am sorry he is not in the Chamber, to be a very ardent prohibitionist, to be one of those men who in perfect good faith have inveighed against the evil of intoxicating drink, one of those men who in perfect good faith have pictured the ruined home, the ragged children, the pale-faced wife of the drunkard, and yet he tells us that we must not adopt a law which will enable his State, when it passes a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale within its borders of these deadly intoxicants, to be protected against pollution from the outside. He tells us that this moral movement will be arrested unless the "Kentucky colonel" is assured of his supply of red liquor even while he stands and votes for the law to prohibit its manufacture within his own State. It makes mighty little difference, Senators, to the wife of the drunkard, it makes mighty little difference to the starving child of the drunkard whether the father got his bottle of whisky at an express office whether the lather got his bottle of whisky at an express omice or at a drug store or at a saloon. It has little to do with the pangs of hunger, with the suffering and agony of the wife and children whether the liquor was imported into the State or made within the borders of the State. But this makes a difference: If prohibition be right, if it ought to be adopted, if the liquor business is an evil business, and if liquor drinking be a dangerous and deadly thing, it does make a difference whether you stop up both sources of supply or whether you only stop one.

Senators talk about being practical with a law of this kind. I will tell you what the practical side of it is, and I will challenge any prohibitionist on this floor to deny the truth of what I say. Any State can easily stop the manufacture of beer within its borders, because great breweries stand where they can be seen; any State can easily stop the manufacture of whisky within its borders, because the distillery is where it can be seen. Now, if a State can stop the manufacture within its borders and no liquor can get in from the outside, you have prohibition practically and easily enforced, but if the borders of that State are open for liquor to flow in from every other source, if it can be sent in through 10,000 channels, then what do you have? The experience of States answers the question. My friend from Kansas, Mr. Thompson, and I had a colloquy some days ago. They have had prohibition upon the statute books in Kansas for many years. My friend and I may disagree as to the character of the enforcement of the law they have in Kansas, but, boiled down, the sole amount of all the discussion was this, that Kansas has stopped its manufacture ever since she has had a prohibitory law, but Kansas has been deluged with liquor from the outside, and whatever there is of drunkenness in Kansas or whatever there is of the misuse of liquor in Kansas has come by virtue of the fact that the liquor was made elsewhere and sent into Kansas. My friend, the Senator from Kansas, and I disagreed about some matters the other day, but he will agree with me on this, that if no liquor was sent into Kansas from the outside, there would be an absolute condition of prohibition and sobriety within the State.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

THOMPSON. As the Senator has called attention to the little difference we had, I should like to know if he will not admit now that in our joint city of Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kans., the law-enforcing element of my State having had great difficulty in dealing with the transportation of liquor across the line had done everything in its power to prevent it. I will ask him further if I did not show him a journal entry of the court proceedings in the Supreme Court of Kansas by which that traffic was stopped by injunction? simply want to get the record straight in this regard.

Mr. REED. I am really sorry the Senator has brought up that question, because it is a mooted one.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to introduce as part of my remarks the court record showing the injunction in those proceedings. This same decree was obtained against a half dozen other liquor concerns of Missouri, the names of which appear in the body of this journal entry.

I wish to say in this connection, I am in favor of the Senator's amendment because I believe it will aid materially in the enforcement of the prohibitory liquor laws in dry States.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator introducing the court record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF KANSAS,

Tuesday, September 10, 1907.

The State of Kansas, ex rel., plaintiff, v. the Kansas City Breweries Co., a corporation, defendant. No. 15491.

JOURNAL ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Co., a corporation, defendant. No. 15491.

JOURNAL ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Now, on this 10th day of September, 1907, this cause coming on for final hearing and adjudication the same is submitted to the court upon the pleadings and proof, the plaintiff appearing by Fred S. Jackson, attorney general of the State of Kansas, and the defendant appearing through its attorneys, Harkless, Crysler & Histed, and thereupon, and after hearing the evidence and being fully advised in the premises, the court finds that the defendant, the Kansas City Breweries Co., is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of laws of the State of Missouri; that the defendant is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling intoxicating liquors, and that the defendant has not at any time made any application to the charter board of the State of Kansas for permission to engage in business as a foreign corporation in this State, and that no permission has been granted by said charter board to the said defendant to so engage in business as a foreign corporation in this State, and that no permission that he charter board nor the secretary thereof, at any time, issued any certificate to defendant authorizing it to do business in the State of Kansas as a foreign corporation, and neither has the defendant illed with the secretary of state of the State of Kansas any certified copy of its charter as provided by the laws of the State of Kansas; that said defendant at the time of the institution of this proceeding, the defendant was engaged in the unlawful sale, barter, and delivery of intoxicating liquors within he State of Kansas, and was keeping and maintaining places within said State where intoxicating liquors were sold, bartered, and given away in violation of law, and where persons were permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and where in-

STATE OF KANSAS, Supreme Court, 88:

I, D. A. Valentine, clerk of the Supreme Court of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a full, true, and correct copy of the journal entry of judgment in the above entitled cause, as the same remains of record at page 432 of journal "KK" of said

[SEAL.]

D. A. VALENTINE,

Clerk Supreme Court.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator introducing the court record; that is all right. The existence of that court record demonstrates that the traffic has existed. The court record has been written enjoining certain men from sending liquor into Kansas. Likewise—and I thought I had it here—the record of the Leavenworth court, a county that probably has a population of 30,000 or 35,000, shows that there were over 300 liquor cases upon the docket at the present term of court. That is not said to throw any reflection on Kansas. I am saying that Kansas would not have any liquor cases and would not have any need for injunctions if this provision becomes a law; and I say, furthermore, that the records of shipments of liquor into prohibition States show the astounding fact that in many of the States that have passed prohibitory laws the consumption per capita is very great.

Now, I can not bring myself to the opinion that men who really are in love with the cause of temperance and prohibition are willing to sit in the Senate and kill off the only measure that is now before them that will protect "dry" territory. can not bring myself to the opinion that they are only half prohibitionists; that they are geographical moralists; that anything done across the red line of a map is all right, but if it is done on the other side of the red line it is all wrong. I can not believe that these good and earnest gentlemen, when they come to consider this question and to reflect upon it, will conclude that a bottle of whisky made in Missouri, 2 miles south of the Iowa-Missouri line, will do any less damage in the State of Iowa than if it had been made 2 miles north of that line. I can not believe that these gentlemen propose "to compromise with evil, to make a league with hell, and a covenant with death." Neither can I believe that these gentlemen, whose moral vision is very broad and luminous, are willing to promote the manufacture of liquor in other States by continuing to afford the manufacturer in other States a market within their own sacred States. I do not believe that this movement is dependent for its success upon the ability of gentlemen to convince a large number of the inhabitants of a State that it is all right to pass the law when it will only reach the other fellow, while they can get all the grog they want through inter-state commerce; that their own habits can still be fed out of the same bottle that they always drank from, albeit the bottle may have to be shipped across a State line. That, sirs, is the most pitiable begging of a question I have ever heard.

I call attention to this fact, and I say again, experience demonstrates it. It was demonstrated in the State of Iowa. They passed a prohibitory law in that State many years ago, and immediately the State became filled with "blind tigers," with crooked dens of iniquity. I lived there. I know whereof I speak. In one city where I lived Government licenses prior to the enactment of prohibitory law had not exceeded 50 or 60. Within 30 days after the law was enacted they had run up to Within 30 days after the law was enacted they had run up to 300. No man takes out a Government license unless he intends to sell liquor. The result was trial after trial, many convictions, and many acquittals. For many years the law remained upon the books; the State was filled with blind tigers, not one of which could have existed if this law had been then enacted, not one of which could have cursed that State by its existence had this law been upon the Federal statute books. So that finally they passed a mulct law and went back to the open saloon, preferring the open saloon to the blind tiger; and then, afterwards, again they went back to the prohibitory law. A much better condition, I think, now exists. Still, prohibition is not prohibition in the State of Iowa, because the State is flooded with liquor from the outside.

So it will be in the State of Nebraska when the present law passed by that legislature becomes effective. I believe it is not yet effective, but when it goes into operation the State of Nebraska will have no difficulty in stopping the breweries of Nebraska. If Nebraska has distilleries, you will have no diffi-culty in suppressing them—not a bit—but the thing you will be met with in the city of Omaha and in the city of Lincoln and in all the other important cities of your beautiful and progressive State will be the constant supply of liquor from the outside. It will not be sold in the open saloon, but it will be sold through drug stores; it will be sold by bootleggers; it will be vended in blind tigers; it will be distributed through clubs, or alleged clubs, where young boys get together behind locked doors, with an unlimited supply of liquor, and drink until they fall over insensible-a worse condition than the open saloon. I propose that you shall be protected against that, and I propose to go further in this law—and it is the first law of the kind that I know of, although others of similar character may have been passed. I propose to say to the man within a pro-hibition State who seeks to set aside and nullify the laws of that State by sending outside for liquor, "You shall yourself be amenable to the law.'

We have now the situation of Senators who have been earnest advocates of prohibition legislation, who have been earnest advocates of a constitutional amendment that will embrace the entire country, standing here and pleading the cause of whisky in interstate commerce, of beer in interstate commerce, or any other kind of liquor in interstate commerce, begging that the railroads shall still be loaded with the stuff, imploring the Senate in the name of temperance and sobriety to continue to flood the dry territory with these evil products.

Let us have at least a record vote. Let us know who are in earnest and who are not in earnest.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The Secretary. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. Ken-YON] proposes to strike out the amendment heretofore agreed to on line 16, page 2, of the amendment agreed to on yesterday, which reads as follows:

Whoever shall order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, into any State or Territory the laws of which State or Territory prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be punished as aforesaid.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. Ashurst voted "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call must proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is absent on official business and is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. Brady].

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. Newlands] and will let my vote stand.

So Mr. Kenyon's motion was rejected.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, at the close of what is known as the Reed amendment I offer the amendment which I send to

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary. After the words "punished as aforesaid," the Senator from Iowa proposes to insert:

Provided, That nothing herein shall authorize the shipment of liquor into any State contrary to the laws of such State.

Mr. REED. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to offer an amendment, namely, to insert in line 3, after the word "fermented," the words "or those articles commonly known as Coca Cola and Peruna."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment to the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, which will be stated.

The Secretary. After the word "fermented," on line 3 of the so-called Jones amendment, it is proposed to insert:

Or those articles commonly known as Coca Cola and Peruna.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if we are going to have prohibition in these Territories, let us make it a thorough and complete renovation. Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to his colleague?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. Is not Peruna already included in the terms of the bill, under the title of "alcoholic liquor"?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know; I think not, but it is clearly alcoholic liquor. Recently I have first conversed with and then written to no less a gentleman than the distinguished Dr. Wiley, of the Health Bureau, as to the desirability of Peruna as a beverage and a drink. He tells me that it is the most novious of drugs and loaded with the poorest of it is the most noxious of drugs and loaded with the poorest of whisky. I asked him regarding Coca Cola, and he tells me that Coca Cola is a drug infinitely dangerous, and one that should be barred generally from our drug shops as a beverage.

This thought has been presented to me—that there was a powerful interest and lobby here pressing this prohibition measure. I said to the gentleman making the statement: "From whom? From the liquor men?" "No; but," he said, "it is from the Peruna and the Coca Cola interests, in order to shut people off from other beverages and hence make them resort

I have here, from Georgia, the Macon Telegraph. Most of you do not know that splendid wealth has been acquired through the manufacture of the decoction known as Coca Cola, and the owner lives in a princely home in Atlanta. This article says that there is a lobby there, and that $50,000 has been put up for the purpose of maintaining the Coca Cola interests. No less a gentleman than Judge Stark is quoted here. I inquired from some of my Georgia friends as to the standing of Judge Stark, and I am told that he is a man of great respectability and judgment and honesty. He says:

A half dozen reputable physicians have stated that there are over 300 girls in Atlanta that are Coca Cola flends and nervous wrecks. Yet these fanatical hypocrites, like the editor of the Commonwealth, could have this number increased in Georgia—and that among our women and children. * * * Coca Cola and such drinks not only make physical wereks out of our men, but destroy the physical welfare of our women and children and make nervous wrecks of them. There are over 2.700 known Coca Cola and "dope" flends in this State, and if all could be numbered it would amount to over 5,000.

Mark you, this is in Georgia, the model of prohibition:

Judge Stark declared that when a similar bill to tax soft drinks was before the legislature in 1913 he had taken the ground that Coca Cola, Chero-Colo, Bludwine, and similar drinks were doing the women and children of Georgia more harm than heavy drinks were doing the men, "That proposition was true then as it is now. But on account of a tremendous lobby backing of the Coca Cola and similar drink influences that bill received the same treatment that the recent prohibition bills had accorded them by the rules committee—an eternal cold-storage sleep in the arms of the committee."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say that he had consulted Dr. Wiley. Did Dr. Wiley state to the Senator what proportion of alcohol was in Coca Cola?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Dr. Wiley did not. Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I have reason to believe that in Peruna there is more alcohol than in gin, and it is undoubtedly an intoxicating beverage, if it can be so called; but the Senator did not state what Dr. Wiley said about Coca Cola.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think the Senator failed to catch my remark. I said that Dr. Wiley had said, regarding Coca Cola, that it was a most noxious and dangerous drug.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. It doubtless has some form of opiate in it, I think.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Possibly. Mr. GALLINGER. But it is not alcoholic.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But I suppose men might chew opium and do all the other evils connected with opium, smoking and everything else, but it would not be compared to the hideous evil of a little alcohol.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It appears from a decision of the Supreme Court last summer that Coca Cola is mainly composed of sugar and water with a little bit of flavoring of coca and cola leaves, but pretty much nothing else except sugar and water. Anyone who is curious on the subject can read the decision of the Supreme Court and ascertain the percentage of sugar and the percentage of water and the quantity of coca and cola leaves, unless they have added liquor to it. It does not appear from the evidence taken in that case that there was any liquor in it at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not say that there was liquor in it; I said noxious drugs. I understand that the human appetite can not be entirely made over and regulated and controlled, and so my friends find Coca Cola and a thousand other decoctions in order to satisfy their tastes.

I came across this clipping that might appeal to the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Mississippi. I cut this out of the New York World:

A temperance cocktail.

TEMPERANCE COCKTAIL MEETS WITH BRUTUS.

The expert drink mixer of the antialcoholic committee of the health department got busy yesterday in an effort to produce a strictly temperance cocktail for New Year's. This is the result:

Take notice, Senator from Washington.

Take a lump of sugar and place in the bottom of a glass. Add two

I do not know what particular brand of grape juice.

Pour in three fingers of grape juice and the juice of half an orange. Serve in a whisky glass half full of cracked ice.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Just let me finish.

declines to yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I would not have the Sena-tor lose the merits of this superb prescription for temperance men. Just let me finish this:

The new receipt was given to Dr. Charles F. Bolduan, director of the bureau of public-hea'th education for publication, but he decided it was unfair to inflict the mixture on the public until he had given it a trial, which he proceeded to do. The result was that he added the following to the directions:

"Mix carefully and pour in the sink."

That was his suggestion, and I commend it to the Senator. Now I want to say a word on this point. I have listened to these distinguished gentlemen's talk of the blessings and benefits of prohibition. I believe the State of the Senator from Washington, who offered this amendment, is a prohibition State. I find in the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the State of Washington rectified 174,023 gallons of spirits in 1916. I find further, running over it, the result in these great Southern States wherein prohibition has been tried to a test—the result is they tell us that these States are dry. I regret to say to my friend from Alabama that Alabama heads the list. The work done by the internal revenue bureau up there last year shows that they seized 603 illicit stills. Alabama is not alone. Arkansas had only 4. Then you come down to Florida, and Florida had 135. And Georgia! Where is my friend from Georgia? Georgia, 667 illicit stills. But oh, now, my friend from North Carolina, do not laugh too gleefully. Let me tell you your tale of wrong. Is your State free from misery, woe, pauperism, drunkenness, beggary, and all the horrors that are known to man? North Carolina—and oh, I love the State and I love the Senator; I have been within the borders of your State and buried some of my kin. In North Carolina they found 883 illicit stills in prohibition, temperance North Carolina.

What have you to say to that? I find illicit stills distributed in Ohio—four thousand some odd—and I find in West Virginia 16 illicit stills were discovered. I believe you are honest, but you do not know your own situation in your own home.

I heard my friend from Kansas [Mr. Thompson] telling something about Kansas. I have a letter here with reference to Kansas. I find this in the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon:

There are considerably fewer than 100 Federal liquor licenses in Kansas. Thirty of them are held in Wichita. The Wichita Beacon has printed the names and addresses of the holders, with the remark that those licenses were not purchased to be framed and hung on the wall. The mayor of Wichita, who has sole charge of the police, has so far failed to show interest. The Beacon wants to know why. Joints are running wild in that city. Names and addresses have been furnished to the police repeatedly. Evidently the mayor of Wichita finds no discomfort in being in a hole.

It says these gentlemen have licenses. They are not purchased simply for ornamental looks on the wall, but they are there to permit them to do business, and they do business

Then I have this written to me by a gentleman, a very delightful man. He says:

I had a slip from a Kansas City paper showing number of arrests for drunkenness-

Great God! can that be?-

for the year ending June 30, 1916. As I remember it, there were 1,783. Ask Senator Thompson to furnish you a copy of police-court records for five years past.

Now, my friends, I hate to bring these things up to you. It is very uncomfortable to you, but, great God! do not think you can arrogate to yourselves all the wisdom and all the propriety in regulating the life of mankind. You are endeavoring in your own way to stretch out sumptuary legislation to regulate the habits and control the place and conditions of society that surround us. These things in a way are a necessity, and you are doing not God's service, but you are doing the service of the other

Mr. President, I feel that you gentlemen are fanatical. This country has been a splendid country since time began. Let me tell you what Tom Jefferson said about it:

Our legislators are not sufficiently apprised of the rightful limits of their power; that their true office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties, and take none of them from us.

Abraham Lincoln said:

Prohibition will work great injury to the cause of temperance. It is a species of intemperance within itself, for it goes beyond the bounds of reason in that it attempts to control a man's appetite by legislation, and in making crimes out of things that are not crimes. A prohibition law strikes a blow at the very principles on which our Government was founded.

Horatio Seymour; Samuel J. Tilden; John Quincy Adams; Thomas Francis Bayard; Roger Q. Mills; Senator Richard Coke, of Texas; Sam Houston; Senator John Sherman; Jefferson Davis; Thaddeus Stevens; Dr. Reid, the editor of the Lancet; Lord Salisbury; Dr. Lyman Abbott; Rev. Samuel R. Wilson; and so on. There are a great number of names here. Here is what the Christian Union Observer says, and I do not know whether that will have any effect on the propaganda or not, for everything is utterly un-Christian to them that looks as if it contained in any way alcohol:

It has been once tried in Massachusetts, and ignominiously failed. It is, according to all accounts, a failure in Rhode Island. In Ohio a similar provision in the constitution prohibiting license gave over the State for years to free liquor, and made Cincinnati a by-word and a repreach.

So the story goes. I might read more from the Kansas City Times, the Chicago Republican, the Rochester Herald. Why, my friends, you have run mad, bereft of reason, certainly of judgment, of fairness, and, I believe, of common sense. I trust this whole provision may be utterly wiped out and the Senate of the United States may not further belittle and disgrace itself with this sumptuary nonsense.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am very much interested in not having an extra session of Congress. I am going to do everything I can to prevent it. I have thus far resisted the temptation that has been very strong to discuss the various suggestions of our friends on the other side. I am going to continue to resist it. We are not trying to remedy all the advertising evils by this amendment; there is one particular one that we are after; and I hope that this amendment to the amendment will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On page 18, line 14, after the word "clerk," I move to insert "clerks and letter carriers at firstclass post offices."

I hope the committee will not oppose this amendment. It simply makes the amendment which the committee adopted as to substitute railway postal clerks applicable to postal clerks in first-class post offices. It does not change the language of the amendment in any other respect.

In this connection I should like to state that the only effect of it would be to induce the postmasters at first-class post offices to limit the number of appointments of substitute clerks and substitute letter carriers, so that there would not be any more of them than would be needed to be appointed as clerks and carriers at the minimum salary of $800 a year after the substitute had performed a service equivalent to 313 days. intended to remedy a situation which has been described in the debate upon this bill and has been fully described in hearings before the Committee on Post Offices of the House of Representatives growing out of the unnecessarily large number substitute clerks and carriers who are required in many of the offices to report every day. There is no work for all of them. Many of them get only enough work to make some $300 or $400 a year; they have families to support, and the consequence is that they are in want and suffering. There is no reason why such an unnecessarily large number of substitutes should be appointed, and if the postmasters are required to appoint them to the position of clerks and carriers at $800 a year after they have been employed for a period of time equivalent to 313 days, then it will limit the number of appointments of substitutes, and the remaining number of substitutes will get a reasonable amount of work and earn sufficient money at least to live in a decent manner.

Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Mr. BRYAN. Washington has offered this amendment. The substitute clerks in the Railway Postal Service were provided for in the bill after an investigation and after the claim was made that they ought to be granted and after the Post Office Department was heard and presented its side. There was a real evil corrected there. A young man might enter as a substitute railway postal clerk at a very small compensation, and in some instances they might be kept in that position looking hopefully to be advanced to be a postal clerk, and somebody else would be transferred into his jurisdiction, and his hopes would be deferred still longer and never realized. The committee considered that and acted upon it.

This matter was never presented to the committee. The Post Office Department has never had an opportunity to be heard upon it. As I understand the Senator's proposition, it is that after a man has been a letter carrier for a year he shall then be made a clerk in a post office. He might be qualified to do the work assigned to a letter carrier—he may have been for several years a letter carrier—but not qualified to be a clerk in the post office

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, he is mistaken as to the proposition. It is that he shall be made a carrier or a clerk. Of course, if he is a substitute carrier he would be made a carrier, and if a substitute clerk he would be made a clerk. That would be in the power of the postmaster to regulate.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not think that sort of legislation should be put on the bill without an opportunity to know what we are doing. Of course, it is not in order unless we reconsider the amendment that has already been adopted. I hope the Senate

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In addition to what I have already tated, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I have offered and as a substitute for it, on page 11, line 8, after the word "pay," to insert:

Provided, That hereafter substitute clerks and substitute letter carriers at first-class post offices who have performed service equivalent to 313 days shall be appointed to the regular clerical or carrier force at the entrance-grade salary, $800.

Mr. BRYAN. I dislike to raise the point of order on the mendment. I asked the Senator from Washington to withamendment. draw it, and he would not do it. I am not going to subject the conference to the delay of considering these matters. If there is any merit in them, they ought to have been submitted to the committee. It is too late now to come in and propose to send these amendments to conference. Of course, they come from people interested, and they hand them in here at the end of the consideration of the bill. It is not fair to the committee and it is not fair to the department. I raise the point of order that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third_time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 15, 1917, approved and signed the following

S. 1553. An act for the relief of Peter Kenney;

S. 2880. An act for the relief of Martin V. Parmer;

ARMY TRANSFERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6850) authorizing the transfer of certain retired Army officers to the active list, which was, on page 1, line 13, after "Provided," to strike out all down to and including the word "retired," on page 2, line 1, and insert: "That such officers shall take rank at the foot of the respective grades which they held at the time of their retirement and."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. While the language of the amendment is not quite as it should be, I think there will be no difficulty in construing it. Therefore I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC-BUILDING SITE AT HONOLULU.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7872) to confirm and ratify the sale of the Federal Building site at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes, which were, on line 7, to strike out the parentheses; and on line 10, to

JACOB B. MOORE.

Mr. OWEN. On February 13 there was received from the House of Representatives a bill (H. R. 14679) for the relief of Jacob B. Moore, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma that the Committee on Claims be relieved from the further consideration of the bill named by him, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state the reason for the change?

Mr. OWEN. This is a claim against the tribal fund of the Chickasaw Tribe, and does not belong to the Committee on Chicksaw Tribe, and does not belong to the Committee on Claims. Under the practice it should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which deals with tribal funds.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Committee on Claims agree with the Senator from Oklahoma that the transfer ought to be

Mr. OWEN. I assume so. I do not know of any objection. The practice is that the Committee on Indian Affairs takes charge of claims against Indian tribal funds.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is this claim to be paid out of the tribal funds?

Mr. OWEN.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I have no objection.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

FARMERS AND MERCHANTS' BANK, HEADLAND, ALA.

the relief of the Farmers and Merchants' Bank, of Headland, Ala., and I submit a report (No. 1061) thereon. mous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I give notice that hereafter I shall raise the point of order on the consideration of all these bills.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no interest in the bill, but I promised the Senator from Alabama that I would ask for its consideration. It is a House bill and refers to a very small item. If the Senator objects, of course it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If made, the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object. Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from North Carolina does not object to the bill going to the calendar, I hope? Mr. OVERMAN. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 208) to grant citizenship to Joseph Beech.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12541) authorizing insurance companies and fraternal beneficiary societies to file

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Johnson of Kentucky, Mr. HILLIARD, and Mr. TINKHAM managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education, to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries, to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects, and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the House has acted upon the report of the committee of conference on the vocational education bill (S. 703). I wish again to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have a print of the report which will easily enable any Senator to see just what changes have been made in the bill as passed by the Senate. The only important change we have made from the Senate action is to concede a board of control, not entirely of Cabinet officers, but adding three men-one the representative of manufacture and commerce, one the representative of agriculture, and one the representative of labor—who, together with the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education, shall constitute the board. That is the important concession that we have made to the House.

We have given up the provision that the Commissioner of Education should be the executive officer, and we have stricken out the provision requiring the board to select four specialists in the respective lines at certain-named salaries to take charge of

I mention this in advance because I hope to-morrow to bring the report to the attention of the Senate and ask action on it.

OFFENSES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8148) to define and punish espionage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair).

The Secretary. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] on behalf of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. My motion is to strike out all after the enacting clause of Senate bill 8148 and to insert a substitute therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The Secretary. In lieu of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

> CHAPTER I. [S. 8148.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether or not these paragraphs are being adopted as we go

Mr. OVERMAN. No. I am merely having the substitute now ad. When the reading of this chapter shall have been finished, I shall ask that it be passed over temporarily, in order that we may consider some other chapters as to which I understand there is no contention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wanted to inquire especially about the paragraph which has just been read in reference to any one writing with invisible ink, and what that really means; what the provision is intended to cover.

Mr. OVERMAN. When we come to that I will explain it; but, I repeat, I am going to ask that this chapter be passed over temporarily. Later I will explain to the Senate what it means.

The reading of the substitute was resumed and continued to the end of chapter 1, as follows:

the end of chapter 1, as follows:

Sec. 2. (a) Whoever, having committed or attempted to commit any offense defined in the preceding section, communicates, delivers, or transmits, or attempts to, or aids or induces another to communicate, deliver, or transmit, to any foreign government, or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether recognized or unrecognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, either directly or indirectly, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, note, instrument, appliance, or information relating to the national defense, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years: Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of this paragraph of this section in time of war shall be imprisoned for life; and (b) whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elleit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, neroplanes, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any mayal or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense or calculated to be, or which might be, directly or indirectly, negrit to the enemy, shall be punished by death or by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not more than 30 years; and (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any intended for the communicate, or attempt to elicit any intended for the armed forces, shiften and of the conduct of any any and or military operations, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense or calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the public defense or calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the public defense or calculated to the contract of the

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that we consider the substitute by chapters, that this chapter be passed over for the present, and that the next chapter be read and considered. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair).

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to make a suggestion, Mr. Presi-I think I have no objection to the course proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, but the Secretary has now read the first chapter, which is a distinct subject in itself.—I am afraid by the time we return to it Senators will have forgotten what is in it.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can have it read at any time. I am trying to hasten the consideration of the bill as much as possible and to have it read by chapters.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the present suggestion or motion?

Mr. OVERMAN. My present suggestion is that we consider the bill by chapters; that temporarily the first chapter be passed over and that we return to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that course, although I do not know whether or not the Senator from North Carolina intends to ask for a vote by chapters. I do not understand how that could be done, and I do not think it could be done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina which print of the bill it is that is now before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. The print of the bill which is now being read is a print which has been furnished by the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator can get a copy of it. What is being read now is the substitute offered for Senate bill 8148, which has been reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have here the committee print of the neutrality bill. S. ---, and I also have Calendar No. 912, being Senate bill 8148, with the original bill stricken through and the amendments printed in italics. Which of these prints is the Senate now acting upon?

Mr. OVERMAN. The print, "Chapter 1, Senate bill 8148," is the substitute reported by the committee for the bill which was introducted; and chapter 2, if the Senator will notice, is the bill which was introduced by myself, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, considered by them, reported back, and included in the substitute which is now offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that I make myself clear, I suppose we are considering the committee's amendments to Senate bill 8148, which was regularly introduced, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and reported back with the recommendation of the committee to strike out all that is marked through and to insert what is printed in italics.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will find that this substitute is exactly what the committee has reported, if he will examine it. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; but why is not the question be-fore the Senate the amendment of the committee reporting to strike out and insert?

Mr. OVERMAN. Because to that I have proposed these 14 bills, included in one, as a substitute for Senate bill 8148. Then, when it is adopted, if it is adopted, I will move to indefinitely postpone all the other bills, as they are all contained in this substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that there were certain amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee to Senate bill 8148, and that it is proposed now by this new bill to strike out the matter contained in the Senate bill and to substitute that which is contained in these chapters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not understand it, but I shall not interfere further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think I can state it so that the Senator will understand it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope so.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary has reported to the Senate 14 different bills out of 17 which were originally introduced. The first of those 14 bills is Senate bill 8148. The Senator from North Carolina has offered as a substitute for that bill the matter which is printed and to which the Senator has called attention, marked "Committee print," which includes not only the matter in Senate bill 8148 but also the matter contained in the other 13 bills. The object of that procedure is to facilitate consideration. Instead of having to take up each of these bills separately and consider them, if the Senate considers this substitute, then the whole 14 bills are before the Senate in the form of a substitute. The only purpose of proceeding in this way is to facilitate the consideration

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no difficulty in under-standing what the Senator from North Carolina has proposed by way of a substitute, but I have great difficulty in reaching any conclusion in respect to the action upon the substitute. has to be considered by chapters. Now, a parliamentary in-quiry. Suppose we consider chapter 2, what action can be taken upon chapter 2 as segregated from the remainder of the

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand, if the Senate is agreeable, we will consider that as adopted; then we will go on to the third chapter, then the fourth chapter, and so forth. When these have been acted upon we will come back, having passed over chapter 1, and consider that, and when that is adopted the question will be whether we will adopt the entire substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. All being correlated.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are all correlated.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; they are not all correlated.

have no relation to each other.

Mr. OVERMAN. Whether they have any relation to each other or not, the Senator understands that each chapter will be considered and adopted, either with or without amendment, or not adopted, and when the whole bill has been gone through with in that way the substitute as an entirety will be open to amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that there is really nothing accomplished by this procedure. The whole bill and every chapter will be open to amendment after we pass through it and informally approve it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Just as in the consideration of tariff bills: as the Senator will remember, we consider them by sections, adopting the sections as we go along, and then, of course, before the final passage of the bill the whole amendment is adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is thoroughly understood that we pass through these chapters to ascertain what objection there is, if any, to them; that after we have done that no formal action is to be taken; and that then the entire bill is open for amendment and consideration precisely as if we had not passed through the chapters, I have no objection whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. That would be its natural parliamentary status anyhow.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this mat-ter is perfectly plain. Each one of these chapters is to be considered as a separate section of a bill. If we approve a given chapter as in Committee of the Whole, that is like adopting a section of any other bill as in Committee of the Whole, and when the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole further amendments can be offered to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just what I asked the Senator from North Carolina, and I do not understand him to agree with the Senator from Minnesota. If we consider chapter 2, there will be no vote on it, but we will have a vote on the bill, as I under-

Mr. NELSON. Certainly we can have a vote on it, as we can on a section of any other bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want that parliamentary procedure thoroughly understood and settled upon before I give my consent to the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have exactly the same thing in mind that the Senator from Iowa has. I think there ought to be a definite understanding before we give unanimous consent to a method of procedure which evidently is understood in different ways. If it is meant that if, for instance, we adopt chapter 2 as in Committee of the Whole, and that chapter is still open to further amendment as in Committee of the Whole after it is adopted and before the bill goes to the Senate, well and good; but if, when we adopt it, it is set aside and can not be further amended as in Committee of the Whole, I want to understand that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that the parliamentary situation is a perfectly simple one. The matter the Senator from North Carolina has presented is offered as a substitute for Senate bill 8148. The question is whether it shall be adopted as a substitute. The substitute is open to amendment in any particular, either by adding to it or by striking from it any section or any chapter as we go along, in order to perfect the substitute before we vote upon it. So, as we go along, if the Senator from Iowa is dissatisfied with a chapter, he can move to strike that out, and if the motion prevails it goes out of the substitute. If the motion fails, chapter remains in the bill, and we vote upon it in connection with the other provisions of the substitute when we reach that parliamentary stage, just the same as in the case of a substitute offered to any other bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President-Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. As I understand, the Senator from North Carolina proposes to consider his substitute by chapters. The Secretary has read chapter 1, and that has been laid aside for further consideration. Now we take up chapter 2, and that may be dealt with. If the Senator from Iowa objects to it, a motion can be made to strike it out or to amend it in any particular.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I have asked all the time is this: Suppose chapter 2 is read and no Senator has any objection to it and no amendment is offered to it, what happens then?

What vote is taken upon chapter 2?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No vote is then taken upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore, when we pass all through the bill I can, if I like, in Committee of the Whole, offer an amendment to chapter 2?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should say so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course.
Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I want to understand.
Mr. OVERMAN. The Secretary is reading the substitute.
Of course there will be a vote on it as in Committee of the Whole, and the substitute before it is finally acted upon can be amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The whole difficulty, in my mind, arises from this: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is asking for unanimous consent to adopt a certain method of procedure, and I understood him to ask that the different chapters be acted upon separately. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHER-LAND] does not state it in that way. He says that, as he under-stands the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the Senate is to consider the chapters separately and then set them aside without action. I do not know which statement is correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is a substitute containing all the bills to which I have referred, each chapter being a separate bill. My idea was to ask unanimous consent to consider each chapter, to have it read, and if any Senator had an amendment to submit to it we would try it out, and then adopt that chapter subject, however, when the whole substitute comes to be voted on, to amendment as to the entire substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Any part of it? Mr. OVERMAN. Of course.

Mr. BORAH. What is the necessity of pursuing any different course than we have pursued heretofore in connection with other bills? Here is a substitute offered for another bill, and why not proceed as usual, and if any Senator has objection when a particular provision is reached, let it go over temporarily and

Mr. OVERMAN. As there seems to be objection to the suggestion I have made, I will ask that the reading be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the proposed substitute.

CHAPTER II. [S. 6813.]

To prohibit and punish the willful making of untrue statements under oath to influence the acts or conduct of a foreign Government, or to defeat any measure of the Government of the United States in a dispute or controversy with any foreign nation.

dispute or controversy with any foreign nation.

SECTION 1. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will, or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government, or of any officer or agent of any foreign Government, in relation to any dispute or controversy with the United States, or with a view or intent to defeat any measure of or action by the Government of the United States, in relation to such dispute or controversy, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should like to have that chapter adopted.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before it is adopted I should like to ask the Senator why it is required that the statement referred to in the second line should be made under oath?

Mr. OVERMAN. It reads:

Whoever shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, under oath—

I will read what the Attorney General says— Mr. STONE. It does not say "or under oath," as the Senator reads it.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it says "orally or in writing, under oath."

Mr. STONE. Yes; "orally or in writing, under oath," and made to influence the action of any foreign government with relation to a dispute between that government and the United tates. Why confine it to a statement "under oath"?

Mr. BORAH. We would not want to punish a man for a States.

mere verbal statement without any seriousness or any verity behind it.

Mr. STONE. Well, let us see. I read further from the provision:

Which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government—

If a statement is made not under oath but made for the purpose indicated, and which the person making it has reason to believe, and does believe, might influence the action of a foreign government unfavorably toward us with respect to some international dispute, it would seem immaterial to me whether it was sworn to or merely vouched for in a statement not sworn to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator would not want to punish, as this chapter provides for punishing, a man who should make a statement which might be calculated to influence a foreign government. It might take place under most unexpected circumstances. But if he goes and deliberately makes it under oath, it shows that there is back of it premeditation, as it were, or the purpose to affect the foreign government and to influence it. If you are going to spread it out to conversations and general statements, to debates and to newspaper publications, and so forth, of course the bill never could get through the Senate in the world.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missourl allow me to state a concrete case that this provision of law exactly fits? The Senator will recall the case of the sinking of the Lusitania. He will recall the fact that a man, whose name I can not recall-

Mr. OVERMAN. Wolf, I think.

Mr. NELSON. I am not sure about the name-made an affidavit that there were munitions and military supplies on board of the ship, and contraband of war, as an excuse for the Germans sinking that ship. It turned out afterwards that that was a falsehood, and my recollection is that he was convicted of perjury and punished for it. Now, this is to meet just such a concrete case as that.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, so far as the purpose of this proposed law goes, that man should have been punished, if under the facts he deserved punishment, for making that statement in writing, even if it had not been verified, as much as and as well as if he had sworn to it. Possibly oral statements should be put upon a different basis, for the reason stated by the Senator from Idaho; but if a man deliberately writes a statement, whether he swears to it or not, there is as much deliberation in its preparation in the one instance as in the other, though perhaps not as much solemnity.

There is another question I should like to ask my friend from North Carolina as to this bill. Beginning with the second word of line 4 I read:

which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent of any foreign government, in relation to any dispute or controversy with the United States, or with a view or intent to defeat any measure of or action by the Government of the United States, in relation to such dispute—

And so forth. While we are proposing to punish a man for making a false statement calculated and intended to influence a foreign government with which we have a disputation, why should it not equally be made an offense for any man to make a statement under oath to unduly influence the Government of the United States, or the responsible officials of the United States, in the same direction?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is covered in another chapter. Mr. BORAH. Well, I hope it is not. What would the Senator do with these editorials and periodical articles which are appearing every day?

Mr. STONE. Whether the falsehood be in an editorial or anything else, if a false statement is made intentionally, deliberately, with knowledge, and for the purpose of influencing the action of the public officials of the United States, and when the writer or publisher knows it to be false, he ought to be held to some accountability, so far as that may be possible under the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, take the case of the reported holding of our ambassador to Germany. It has been repeated over and over again until a great many people believe it to be true. I do not know whether there is any foundation for it or not. If there is no foundation for it, it certainly is a very great error on the part of some one.

Mr. STONE. It is worse than an error.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would the Senator reach that class of offenders?

Mr. STONE. Yes; I would. If they knew-mind you, there must be knowledge-or had every reason to believe that it was false, and deliberately scattered a falsehood of that kind broadcast over the land, and especially among the responsible officials of the Government, to influence the action of this Government in its dealings with a foreign country with which we were having a dispute, I think they ought to be held amenable as well as if the purpose of the false statement should be to influence a foreign government against us.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was not under oath, though. Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not to be presumed, of course, that these publications of which we speak would come technically within this rule; but every publication would be put upon its defense upon the simple question of whether or not, at the time the publication appeared, the writer of the article had knowledge of the falsity of the statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. All these sections cover that.

Mr. BORAH. And I think it would be a limitation which we would not want to put upon a discussion of these questions at this time, even if they are delicate questions.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, we have no law at all upon this subject now, as to false swearing. This applies only to verbal statements and false statements made, and it makes them a crime. We have no law at all upon the subject now. I note what the Attorney General says in his report:

At present no law exists under which false swearing intended to influence the Government in controversies with a foreign nation can be prosecuted. Unless the false swearer shall repeat his false statement in some grand jury or other judicial proceedings, so that he may be indicted for perjury, he may at present entirely escape punishment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is no shadow of doubt in the mind of any intelligent or fair-thinking man that there is a cabal of great newspapers in this country working in a conspiracy to create a condition which they think may coerce the Government of the United States into an attitude of hostility to one of the belligerent powers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I think the matter he is talking about will be covered in the first chapter of this bill, which I have passed over temporarily. All the matters that he is talking about now will come up in that part of the bill.

Mr. STONE. I am not arguing the matter especially with a view of offering any amendment, but I am saying what I do with a view to expressing my opinion, and putting it in the RECORD and before my colleagues of the Senate, that I believe that men who try unduly and by false statements to involve this country in the disasters of war are public enemies, no matter what their pretensions to virtue and patriotism; and that the publication or the mere making for public use in any way of bitter and venomous false statements, whether intended to influence the action of a foreign government or our own Government, ought to be curtailed, if not prohibited, as far as possible. I think the effect of the law ought to bear upon those who seek deliberately to mislead their own government as well as upon those who make statements intended to mislead the foreign Government with which we may have a dispute. It ought to work both ways, and in many respects it is more important that it should operate with respect to our own Government.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment? I want to call his attention to the last part of this provision, commencing in line 8:

Or with a view or intent to defeat any measure of or action by the Government of the United States.

So that it is not only a question as to the effect it has on the foreign power, but also as to the effect it has on the Government of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Well, "to defeat"; not to "initiate." Mr. NELSON. "Or with a view or intent to defeat any measure of or action by the Government of the United States in relation to such dispute or controversy."

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose, Mr. President, section 3 of the first chapter might cover that:

Whoever, in time of war, shall, by any means or in any manner-

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is in time of war, is it not?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; that is in time of war.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is not what we are talking about.
Mr. OVERMAN. I think we have another section which covers it in time of peace

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the proposed substitute. The Secretary read as follows:

CHAPTER III.

[S. 6816.]

To prevent and punish the impersonation of officials of foreign governments duly accredited to the Government of the United States.

Section 1. Whoever within the jurisdiction of the United States shall falsely assume or pretend to be a diplomatic or consular, or other official of a foreign government duly accredited as such to the Government of the United States, with intent to defraud such foreign government or any person, and shall take upon himself to act as such, or in such pretended character shall demand or obtain, or attempt to obtain from any person or said foreign government, or any officer thereof, any money, paper, document, or other valuable thing, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

CHAPTER TV [S. 6797.]

To regulate and safeguard the issuance of passports, and to prevent and punish the fraudulent obtaining, transfer, use, alteration, or forgery thereof.

Section 1. Before a passport is issued to any person by, or under authority of, the United States, such person shall subscribe to and submit a written application duly verified by his oath before a person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which said application shall contain a true recital of each and every matter of fact which may be required by law or by any rules authorized by law to be stated as a prerequisite to the issuance of any such passport.

Sec. 2. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly make any false statement in an application for passport or otherwise, with intent to induce or secure the issue of a passport under the authority of the United States, either for his own use or the use of another, contrary to the laws regulating the issuance of passports or the rules prescribed pursuant to such laws; or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use, or furnish to another for use any passport, the issue of which was secured in any way by reason of any false statement, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Sec. 3. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use, any passport issued or designed for the use of another than himself, or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use any passport in violation of the conditions or restrictions therein contained, or of the rules prescribed pursuant to the laws regulating the issuance of passports; or whoever shall willfully and knowingly furnish, dispose of, or dcliver a passport to any person, for use by another than the person for whose use it was originally issued and designed, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to introduce two amendments that have been suggested to that chapter, and ask to have read a letter from the Attorney General on the subject. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "a person authorized and empowered to administer ouths," and to insert in lieu thereof the following: Such person as may be designated by the President or by the Secretary of State to administer such oaths.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that it will read how?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to that amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the letter of the Attorney General be read as to the two amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the second amendment and the letter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a moment. I should like to have the first amendment read again. I have the floor. Will the Secretary read the amendment again?

The Secretary. On page 12, lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "a person authorized and empowered to administer oaths," and to insert in lieu thereof "such person as may be designated by the President or by the Secretary of State to administer such oaths," so that the section if amended will read:

Before a passport is issued to any person by or under authority of the United States, such person shall subscribe to and submit a written application duly verified by his oath before such person as may be designated by the President or by the Secretary of State to administer such oaths such oaths

And so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina prefer that the letter of the Attorney General shall be read before I state my objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; so that the Senator can understand what the Attorney General desires.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.
Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette], I am willing to let these amendments be printed and go over, and have the letter of the Attorney General printed in the RECORD, so that Senators will understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be printed in the

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The amendments and letter above referred to are as follows:

The amendments and letter above referred to are as follows:

1. Page 12, lines 4 and 5, strike out "a person authorized and empowered to administer oaths" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "such persons as may be designated by the President or by the Secretary of State to administer such oaths."

2. Insert, at the end of section 1, on page 12, the following: "Clerks of United States courts, agents of the Department of State, or other Federal officials authorized or who may be authorized to take passport applications and administer oaths thereon, shall collect for all services in connection therewith a fee of $1, and no more, in lieu of all fees prescribed by any statute of the United States, whether the application is executed singly, in duplicate, or in triplicate."

Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Senator: The State Department has just presented to me two minor additions which it says are very essential to the bill originally 8. 6797, now chapter 4 of the committee print neutrality bill, relative to passports.

1. To amend lines 4 and 5, page 12, so as to read as follows:
"His oath before such persons as may be designated by the President or by the Secretary of State to administer such oaths, which said application shall contain a true."

2. To insert, at the end of section 1, on page 12, the following:
"Clerks of United States courts, agents of the Department of State, or other Federal officials authorized or who may be authorized to take passport applications and administer oaths thereon, shall collect for all services in connection therewith a fee of $1, and no more, in lieu of all fees prescribed by any statute of the United States, whether the application is executed singly, in duplicate, or in triplicate."

The object of this addition is to clear up a situation which now exists. At present clerks of courts are the officials designated by the President, through the Secretary of State, to take passport applications and administer oaths. Under the present fee system there is a great variance in the practice of these clerks of courts, and many of them, it has been found, charge fees which are quite exorbitant, but which seem to be lawful under the present statutes. The fees charged, it has been found, have varied from $1.50 to about $6. The Chief of the Citizenship Bureau of the State Department and the Chief of the Division of Accounts in this department, both of which gentlemen have had long experience in these matters, have come to the conclusion that a fee of $1 is ample in such cases and that larger fees are or may be an unnecessary hardship on citizens applying for passports.

This is a matter which has been presented to my attention for the first time to-day, and was not considered by me or, apparently, by the State Department when the final draft of the bill on this subject was submitted to it.

Respectfully,

T. W. Gregory,

T. W. GREGORY, Attorney General.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the proposed substitute, as follows:

SEC. 4. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, counterfeit, mutilate or alter, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered any passport or instrument purporting to be a passport, with intent to use the same, or with intent that the same may be used by another; or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use, or furnish to another for use any such false, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered passport or instrument purporting to be a passport, or any passport validly issued which has become void by the occurrence of any condition therein prescribed invalidating the same, shall be fined not exceeding $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 5. All offenses committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to the taking effect hereof under any law embraced in or changed, modified, or repealed by this chapter may be prosecuted and punished, and all suits and proceedings for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to the taking effect hereof may be commenced and prosecuted, in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

Chapter V.

CHAPTER V. 18, 6798,1

To prohibit and punish the fraudulent use, application, or counterfeiting of the seal of any executive department or government commission.

of the seal of any executive department or government commission.

Section 1. Whoever, not being duly authorized and empowered so to do, shall fraudulently affix or impress the seal of any executive department, or of any bureau, commission, or office of the United States, to or upon any certificate, instrument, commission, document, or paper of any description; or whoever, with knowledge of its fraudulent character, shall with wrongful or fraudulent intent use, buy, procure, sell, or transfer to another any such certificate, instrument, commission, document, or paper, to which or upon which said seal has been so fraudulently affixed or impressed, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Sec. 2. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, counterfeit, mutilate or alter, or cause or procure to be made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated or altered, or shall willingly assist in falsely making, forging, counterfeiting, mutilating or altering, the seal of any executive department, or any bureau, commission, or office of the United States, or whoever shall knowingly use, affix, or impress any such fraudulently made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated or altered seal to or upon any certificate, instrument, commission, document or paper of any description, or whoever with wrongful or fraudulent intent shall have possession of any such falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated or altered seal, knowing the same to have been so falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated or altered, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

CHAPTER VI.

CHAPTER VI. [S. 6815.]

To prevent and punish conspiracy to injure or destroy property situated within and belonging to a foreign Government with which the United States is at peace, or of any subdivision or municipality thereof.

States is at peace, or of any subdivision or municipality thereof.

Section 1. If two or more persons within the jurisdiction of the United States conspire to injure or destroy property situated within a foreign country, State, or Province with which the United States is at peace, when the offense designed to be committed in such foreign country constitutes a felony under the laws thereof, and when one or more of such persons commits an act within the jurisdiction of the United States to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

Mr. President I want to call effective

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to call attention to a provision in this chapter, for fear it may be overlooked hereafter. The language of it is, beginning on line 4:

When the offense designed to be committed in such foreign country constitutes a felony under the laws thereof.

A felony is one thing under the rules of the common law, and it may be an entirely different thing under the rules of law that prevail in other countries, as, for example, France, where there may not be such a thing as a felony. I do not know whether there is or not. We have statutes that define what shall constitute a felony. The statutes differ from the common-law definition. We have written into our own statutes, in the Criminal Code, a definition of a felony; so I think that the word "felony' is an unfortunate term to use here. I think we had better use the word "crime" so that it will read: "constitutes a crime under the laws thereof."

I make that suggestion for the consideration of the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is right. I know that in England what constitutes a misdemeanor and what constitutes a felony is well defined in Blackstone, but I do not know about France and other countries. I have no idea what the law is there. I know what would be a felony in Great Britain; but what would be a felony in France I do not know.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It may be a crime, but not a felony,

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. I make that suggestion.
Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not think it was intended to punish under this section conspiracies that involve every sort of crime. Under the laws of some countries what would be regarded as a crime might be of very little consequence. The word "crime" would involve merely the commission of some offense which was denounced as criminal. A felony is a specific thing, and if the laws of a country declare that a certain offense is a felony then it is easy to produce that law, and the whole question is settled. The word "crime" seems to me to be too general.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I recognize the force of what the Senator says; but the difficulty is that there may not be such a thing as a felony under the laws of some foreign countries. We use the term to distinguish it from a misdemeanor. There may not be such a distinction at that. At any rate, if the word "crime" is not used I would put in some provision to the effect that it should be a crime punishable by imprisonment for more than a year, or something of that sort

Mr. FLETCHER. I should think the term "crime punishable by imprisonment" would cover it. That would perhaps make it a little clearer than to make it simply "crime."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose this law is passed as it reads now, and a person should be changed with conscious to injury or destroy respective. be charged with conspiring to injure or destroy property in France. Can the Senator tell us under the laws of France, whether or not any offense of that character would constitute a felony?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would not be able to say, of course, unless I examined the laws. I would have to refer to the laws.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the difficulty.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senators will yield to me, I think the term "felony" is a term that is known only to the American and the English common law, or where the common law prevails; that in all the other countries, outside of the scope of the common law, they are under what you might call the Roman law. That is the basis of the law, modified in some countries, as in France, by the Code Napoleon. But they all have different terms by which they designate crimes; and the term "felony," as I understand, is not known in any criminal law of Continental Europe in the sense that we use it in American and English law. Hence, I think it would be wise to say "a crime punishable by imprisonment"; or you might say "by imprisonment of not less than one year."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why not say "crime punishable by imprisonment"?

Mr. NELSON. Well, that is sufficient.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. We have now defined, in the statutes of the United States, a felony as constituting a crime punishable by not less than a year's imprisonment. Prior to the writing of that definition in the Criminal Code, as the Senator knows, there was always a great deal of confusion in determining what constituted a felony. The court had to go back to the rules of the common law in order to determine whether or not the crime was a felony. But we have now made that simple definition in our statutes, and I am inclined to think we might simply write that definition into the law. Instead of using the term "felony," let it read "crime punishable by imprisonment for not less than one year."

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is a very wise provision, and if the Senator will offer it now I will be glad to have him do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will offer it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not better to use the term punished by imprisonment" than to put in a period?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well; I will not insist on the other

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are a great many crimes and a broad latitude should be given to the judge to punish by imprisonment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will present it in that form. I move to strike out "felony" and insert "crime punishable by imprisonment."

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 6, strike out the word felony" and insert "crime punishable by imprisonment." The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHAPTER VII. [S. 6799.1

To amend section 13 of the act "to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

SECTION 1. Section 13 of the act "to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: Whoever within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States begins, or sets on foot or furnishes money, or provides or prepares the means for, or who takes part in any military or naval expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States is at peace, shall be fined not more than $3,000 and imprisoned not more than three years.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina what cases are intended to be reached by this chapter that are not covered by the existing law? On a comparison I find that the only difference between the chapter and the existing law is the introduction of the phrase "or furnishes money."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, it amplifies it by inserting the word "naval." The word naval is added where the law simply says "set on foot or takes part in any military expedition." I do not myself see that it is necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not a naval expedition a military expedi-

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so, but the Attorney General seems to think it is necessary to use that word, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I care nothing about that, but the words "or furnishes money" are inserted, as I remember. I can not see the occasion for them, unless they are intended to embrace something that I can not favor.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Attorney General says:

It is desirable that contribution of money for such unlawful expeditions or enterprises should be made illegal in express terms, although it is probably included within the meaning of "provides or prepares the means for" in the present statute.

Those are the only words added, and they ought to be added. The law ought to be more explicit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from North Carolina think the words "provides or prepares the means for" do not cover the furnishing of money?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That language is already in the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not the words "furnishes money." Mr. SUTHERLAND. The words "or provides or prepares the means for" are in the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say they cover the furnishing of money, and I wondered-

Mr. OVERMAN. The Attorney General says, further, that he wants to make it more specific; that there might be some doubt in the court as to whether the furnishing of money was included or not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language which is added is "or who takes part in any military or naval expedition."

Mr. SHIELDS. The most serious objection I see is its generality. This is a very broad statute:

Whoever within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States begins, or sets on foot, or furnishes money, or provides or prepares the means for, or who takes part—

It is emphasized by the latter provision-or who takes part in any military or naval expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence-

And so forth. One may furnish money or means for an expedition of this kind without knowing it. The word "knowingly " ought to there, so as to read:

Whoever within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States begins, or sets on foot, or knowingly furnishes money, or provides—

And so forth.

Mr. CHMMINS That is not the thought I had in mind. Anyone who furnishes money in the course of preparation for an enterprise carried on in a foreign country would already be guilty under the statute. Anyone who furnishes money no matter whether he knows it is to be used in such an enterprise or not becomes guilty.

Mr. SHIELDS. And might be convicted under this statute?
Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.
Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the word "knowingly" be inserted.

Mr. OVERMAN. Inserted where?

Mr. SHIELDS. In line 6, after the word "or," where it first appears in that line, and before the word "furnishes."

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator proposes a limitation that is not in the original statute of which this is amendatory.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then it ought to have been in the original statute.

Mr. OVERMAN. That has been the law for a long time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that that has been the form of the statute for a hundred years and no unjust result has flown from it. I would hesitate to make changes in these statutes that have been on the books so long and that have been administered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand from the Senator from Iowa that the phrase "furnishes money" is not in the original statute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not in the statute. The wording is entirely new and intended, of course, to cover some different

Mr. OVERMAN. The only words added are "furnishes money." The original statute is amended by adding the word "naval" and the words "furnishes money," that is all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the word "knowingly" then simply qualify the phrase, so as to read "or knowingly furnishes money.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the amendment, I understand, of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that would not be objection-

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment I offered was to place the word "knowingly" before the word "furnishes," so as to read "knowingly furnishes money."

The Secretary. On page 18, line 6, before the word "furnishes," insert the word "knowingly," so as to read "or sets on foot or knowingly furnishes money."

The amendment was agreed to. The Secretary read as follows:

> CHAPTER VIII. [8, 6812.]

To regulate and restrain the conduct and movements of interned soldlers and sailors of belligerent nations, and for other purposes.

and sallors of belligerent nations, and for other purposes.

Section 1. Whoever, being a person belonging to the armed land or naval forces of a belligerent nation or belligerent faction of any nation and being interned in the United States, shall leave or attempt to leave said jurisdiction, or shall leave or attempt to leave the limits of internment in which freedom of movement has been allowed, without permission from the proper official of the United States in charge, or shall overstay a leave of absence granted by such afficial, shall be subject to arrest by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by the military or naval authorities thereof, and shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined and safely kept for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct.

Sec. 2. Whoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States and subject thereto, shall aid or entice any interned person to escape or attempt to escape from the jurisdiction of the United States, or from the limits of internment prescribed, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. CHIMMINS. Before passing from this chapter I should

Mr. CUMMINS. Before passing from this chapter I should like a little information from the Senator from North Carolina. I do not know just what the status of a soldier or a sailor or anyone belonging to the armed land or naval forces of a belligerent nation in our country is. Is he under arrest? Is he limited to a particular place? Are his movements controlled by some law of our own country or by the law of nations? I ask these questions because I have not had time to examine the subject and I do not know.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no rule of international law on this subject. The Attorney General says:

Under the rules of international law, a belligerent warship and its crew is required to intern in the port of a neutral nation under certain circumstances. There is no present statute which prevents a breach of the internment or escape of the crew.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that we are preparing the way here for a possible act of war. We are making it a criminal offense for any soldier or sailor of a belligerent who happens to be interned in our country, and I do not know just what that means, to leave the limits of the internment; and we are providing that if he does leave these limits he may be arrested by a marshal or by military authority, returned to the place of his internment and kept there just as long as the official in charge shall direct, whether that be 10 minutes or 10 years. There is no limit to the authority here conferred. I can not speak about the matter with very much certainty because I do not know what the status of such a person is in the United States, but I do know that we ought not to authorize a marshal or an officer of our Army to violate international law or a treaty that we may have with the nation of which the soldier or the sailor is a subject or a citizen.

I will be very glad if some one who is familiar with these things will tell the Senate what the status is and by what law the so-called interned sailors and soldiers are controlled. I do not want to give a deputy marshal or a military officer power to abrogate all our treaties and commit an act of war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not say that I am thoroughly familiar with the subject, but my understanding is that an interned armed vessel covered by this provision, under the rules of international law and by all our treaties, is limited as to the length of time within which it can leave, and having stayed that length of time and having abandoned the purpose to leave, the right to leave ceases

Mr. CUMMINS. What, then, becomes of the persons on board the boat? Are they under arrest? Are they prisoners of the United States after that time?

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator from Iown mean the members of the military or naval forces of the belligerents?
Mr. CUMMINS, That is what I mean,

Mr. HUGHES. There are two classes of interned men in this country. There are those men connected with the steamship lines

Mr. CUMMINS. They are not interned at all.
Mr. HUGHES. As to the others, I can only say to the Senator that frequently during the course of the European war men belonging to the various belligerents have been forced over the boundary line of other nations, and in that case they immediately become prisoners of war of that neutral nation. two cases have occurred where those men escaped. One very noted case was that of an aviator. His friends arranged a very elaborate scheme to escape and enabled him to get to Paris, and thereupon the French Government immediately had him returned and committed to the jurisdiction and control of the neutral government from which he had escaped.

I should say in answer to the Senator's question that the interned are the men from the military or naval forces of any of those belligerents who come into this country, take refuge in this country, and the men who escape must be held as prisoners of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume it must mean, so far as Europe is concerned, an armed ship in one of our harbors which is interned remaining there during the hostilities. Now, what is the status of the men on board?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The United States Government, as I understand it, gives them protection, and in return for that right assumes the responsibility of retaining them until the war is over?

Mr. CUMMINS. Retaining them where?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the penitentiary? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not?

Mr. SMITH of Géorgia. I do not think so, because they have committed no crime.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so. I think they are required to be kept on the ship.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I was trying to find out. Mr. OVERMAN. And they are to be returned, as this statute provides, to the ship and safely kept there.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not say so.

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator will find they can be incarcerated at any point, in the discretion of the Executive of this Government and the military authorities of the Government, if it be deemed necessary to incarcerate them. There have been a great many thousand men interned in the United States within the last two years. Some of them have been kept in prison; some of them have been put in jail; some have been placed in stockades; and some have been paroled. A majority of the Germans who were interned upon warships that sought refuge in our harbors and held as prisoners of war have been paroled, we becoming responsible to the other belligerent Governments for

Mr. WILLIAMS. Paroled officers, if the officer is willing to take the parole.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the case referred to by the Senator from Iowa, the bill provides that they-shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined and safely kept for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct.

That is the case I suppose of interned warships and sailors. Mr. CUMMINS. I move to strike out the words "for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct."

Mr. OVERMAN. Leaving it indefinite as to how long they shall be kept?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no. Leaving the President of the United States to say when they shall be released. Suppose the war ends, may the official in charge still keep them?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think he would keep them.
Mr. CUMMINS. He might not, but I see no reason for giving him the power after that time to keep them.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that the internment naturally expires when the ground for which they were interned ceases to exist. They were interned because of the existence of war and because they have come into our harbor. When the war condition ceases the ground for their internment ceases and they are entitled to their liberty.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the very reason I have offered the amendment. I want the term of their confinement to be determined at least by the event of the war and not by the will of the official.

Mr. NELSON. You simply move to strike out those words and insert nothing in their place?

Mr. CUMMINS It would then read "shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined."

Mr. NELSON. That is indefinite.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is definite enough, is it not? Mr. OVERMAN. They can only be interned until the President or official in charge shall direct that they shall be discharged.

Mr. CUMMINS. Do you want the official in charge to determine how long they shall be kept?

Mr. OVERMAN. They can not keep them after the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. How do you know? Of course, I know he would not, but why give him any authority to do it?

Mr. FLETCHER. The only official in charge is acting under superior authority. He could not do it unless his superior authority ordered him to keep them. You have got to have some margin as to the length of time they will be kept there or what will terminate the right to their confinement. "Official in charge" is rather indefinite I admit, but it seems to me that it is about the only way you can express it. Of course, the official in charge is acting under higher authority, and when his superior authority ceases to hold them and the cause of their being retained disappears he must give the order for their

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course it may not be very important. This whole series of bills is full of attempts to enlarge the power of inferior and subordinate officials.

Mr. FALL. I think, Mr. President, the meaning of this section is that it applies to the attempt to violate their parole by interned prisoners. For instance, when a ship's crew, we will say a German ship's crew, for example, in this country is interned in a certain place, there are certain privileges granted to them under their parole; that they must report at certain times or that they must not go beyond certain limits or that they must not attempt to return to Germany. In the event of a violation of that parole under this section it is the privilege of the officer having charge of those interned to direct the United States marshal or other official to arrest any paroled prisoner violating his parole and to return him to the place of internment, and there the officer who has charge of the interned prisoners can lock him up if necessary. He has the power, in the first place, to confine him in any way necessary to prevent his escape. Having violated his parole, he is brought back there, and he is placed in safe keeping, even if it is necessary to lock him up, and he is kept there until the term of internment expires by the ordinary rules in the event it is necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understand it; and therefore there is no possible use of the last clause. They are interned, and they escape. Now, no matter whether they have been paroled or not, they escape, and the marshal or other officer arrests them and brings them back. When they are returned, they have the status which they originally had, and no other.

Mr. FALL. They are punished for the violation of their parole by confinement for such period within the terms of their internment as the officer in charge may think necessary; in other words, they may be punished by 5 or 10 days' close confinement.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is just that power that I am not willing to give the officer in charge.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, would this language meet the objection of the Senator from Iowa: Instead of striking out the words suggested by the Senator leave them in down to the word direct," in line 13, and add "or during the period of internment," so that it would read:

And shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined and safely kept for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct, or during the period of internment.

I think that would meet the Senator's contention.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not entirely meet it. My idea is that we are dealing with foreign people; they are interned in our country. It has been said they are prisoners of war, and I am willing to accept that, although I do not think they are exactly "prisoners of war." They are allowed certain liberties, certain One of them violates the privilege that has been accorded to him and escapes; and the marshal or the officer of the Army or of the Navy arrests him and brings him back. There he is again in the place of internment. What we are trying to do is to give the official who happens to be in charge of that place of confinement or internment the power to punish such a man in any way that he sees fit, without any review or appeal or hearing.

Mr. OVERMAN. How punish him? I do not understand how the language gives the officer any authority to punish the prisoner.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Fall] has just said that you could put the prisoner in a cell to punish him for escaping.

Mr. OVERMAN.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the officer could easily enough do so under this language. I am not so solicitous about these foreigners so far as the humanities are concerned; I am not speaking especially for them-

Mr. OVERMAN. I would not consent to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Although I think it is somewhat uncivilized; but I am concerned in giving power to a subordinate official to commit an act upon a foreign citizen that may be cause for war.

That ought not to be done.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see any language in the bill that will allow the official to punish anyone because it authorizes him to keep him safely confined for a period of time. Of course, when the war is over, the official can not keep him any longer.

Mr. CUMMINS. The language is, "and there confined and safely kept." How confined?

Mr. OVERMAN. Sufficiently confined to keep him from running away again; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it is necessary the officer could put him on bread and water and keep him in solitary confinement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not say that, but the language is very indefinite.

Mr. OVERMAN. Any officer doing that would himself be subject to being indicted and imprisoned.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is unnecessary to offend the civilized sense of the world in that way, and why should we do it? When we capture a man and bring him back into the place of internment and keep him there

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all that is authorized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is all it says

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree with the Senator from Mississippi upon that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the original bill contained the words "closely confined." In the committee we struck out that language, so that it simply means now that the prisoner shall be taken back and confined as he was before, and nothing more.

Mr. BORAH. What would you do with him after you took him back if you did not confine him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa what he would think of adding after the word "direct" the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the ; so that any such action must be reported to the Secretary of the Navy and must receive the approval of a Cabinet officer, thereby putting under the supervision of a Cabinet officer any treatment that these foreigners might receive?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, these matters with reference to the treatment of interned prisoners are all covered by the ordinary rules of nations in times of war, and this Government owes a duty not only to the prisoners themselves who are interned but it owes a duty to the belligerents on the other side to see that such prisoners are safely kept.

This Government, if it thinks it necessary, can, in the first place, order interned soldiers or sailors to be closely confined anywhere that it pleases to put them, which the Government thinks is necessary for their safekeeping. Of course, we are supposed to treat them as civilized human beings. In the event that in our discretion we allow these interned soldiers or sailors to be paroled and to be given certain liberties within a certain district upon their word of honor or upon their oath that they will not violate our good treatment, and they do violate it, this simply provides that they may be returned and, in the discretion of the officer having charge of them, that they may be safely kept, he may use such means as are necessary to safely keep them, even if it be incarcerating them in the penitentiary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is always well to ask the why of things, in order to determine how far you ought to go. If it were not for this very principle of international law involved here, no neutral country could ever remain neutral in war at all, because the losing belligerent could just cross the border and reorganize, remobilize, rearm, and return to the scene. If they could do that, the successful belligerent would have the right to follow them into the neutral country. To prevent that the law of nations provides that when one of the belligerents shall retreat into a neutral country, then it shall become the duty of the neutral country to prevent them leaving and participating in the war again. The reason of it is that, in consideration of it, the successful beligerent surrenders the right to follow the defeated enemy into a neutral country, and the consideration paid by the neutral country is that it shall keep them until the expiration of hostilities. But for that principle of law, applying it now to the high seas-I have illustrated it on land-one fleet might be following another, and the defeated fleet might take refuge in a harbor of the United States. If it had a right to take refuge there and subsequently come out again, perhaps refitted and equipped, then the other fleet would have a right to follow it into the harbor, and we would have naval battle between other peoples engaged in a war in which we were not concerned in a United States harbor and within our 3-mile jurisdiction. It is to avoid that that this rule of nations has been established and universally recognized and is maintained. The neutral is under international obligation to receive and keep and hold until the end of a war the armed forces of a belligerent fleeing to its territory or harbors.

The language of the proposed act is:

Shall be returned to the place of internment, and there confined a safely kept for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] imagines he can get out of that language that they—the interned belligerents—are in danger to "be put on bread and water." That would be a violation of The Hague conventions and all of the agreements among nations and all of the international law of the world. Nor does the language say anything from which that could be inferred. They shall be "confined and safely kept"; that is all. You do not have to give a man bread and water to safely keep him. You may keep him as safely on beefsteak, if you put him in a place whence he can not escape.

If there is any doubt about it at all it is that somebody might think that we might exceed the proper period of internment, which is the period of hostilities. As a matter of fact, we would not; but if anybody has that sort of a notion it would be well to put after the word "direct" the words "during the period of internment," or "so long as hostilities shall endure."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator that make the terms of the period of the senator of the period of the senator of the sena tor, that would make it very much worse, because this is intended, as I now find out—I did not know that until we got into the discussion-to give the official in charge the authority to punish the man who has gone beyond the limits of the place of internment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If reconfinement and safe-keeping may be called punishment, yes; but no other punishment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not reconfinement—"confinement."

He was confined before, was he not? Yes; he was. Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. CUMMINS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if he is confined again it is reconfinement, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it is not. When they are originally interned, I take it, they are allowed some liberty of movement; they are interned in a place, and not in a jail; but if one of them violates his privilege, then he is arrested and brought back and the official in charge of that place of internment can then punish him for that violation by confining him, I take it, in some other way than he was originally confined, and safely keeping him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The official would have to keep him more carefully than at first, else he would escape again. That much is true. As a rule, in the case of sailors the place of internment is their ship, and unless they grossly abused the privilege that would remain their place of interment. Of course, the Government could designate a different place, but for sailors the place of internment is generally a ship, while for an Army it is usually a camp, just as the Belgians now interned in Holland have a camp which is guarded by Dutch troops and from which they can not escape, and if any one of them did escape he would be brought back, and, I suppose, would be put in some closer confinement; but that is all. He could not be punished in any sense except in the sense that a closer and more careful and safer confinement might be called a punishment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary. On page 19, lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "for such period of time as the official in charge shall direct."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHAPTER IX.

To authorize the seizure, detention, and condemnation of arms and munitions of war in course of exportation or designed to be exported or used in violation of the laws of the United States, together with the vessels or vehicles in which the same are contained.

Section 1. Whenever, under any authority vested in him by law, the President of the United States by proclamation, or otherwise, shall forbid the shipment or exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States to any other country, or whenever there shall be good cause to believe that any arms or munitions of war are being, or are intended to be employed or exported in connection with a military expedition or enterprise forbidden by section 13 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors and inspectors of customs, the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other person duly authorized for the purpose by the President may selze and detain any arms or munitions of war about to be so exported or employed, and the vessels or vehicles containing the same, and retain possession thereof until released, or disposed of as hereinafter directed.

Src. 2. It shall be the duty of the person or persons making any selzere under this chapter to apply, with due diligence, to the judge of the district ocurt of the United States for the district within which any such spotenty so selzed; which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation showing that there is known or probable cause to believe that the property selzed is being, or is intended to be, exported, used, or employed in the manner or for the purpose prohibited by section 1 of this chapter; and if raid judge shall refuse to issue such warrant, or application therefor shall not be made by the officer making such selanous whom selzed. If the said judge shall be satisfied that the selzure was justified under the provisions of this chapter, and issue his warrant accordingly, then the property shall be detained by the person selzing it, until the President, who is hereby expressly authorized so to do, shall order it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it shall be a suit of the condemnation proceedings, as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 3. The owner or claimant of any property selzed under this chapter may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which such seizure was made, setting forth the facts in the case; whereupon said court shall advance said cause for hearing and determination, with all possible dispatch, and, after easing forth the person making such selzure, shall proceed to hear and decide whether the property selzed the same.

Sec. 4. Whenever the person making any selzure under this chapter shall have applied for and obtained a warrant for the detention of the person who selzed the same.

Sec. 5. The proceedings in such summary t

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to section 8 which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated. The Secretary. It is proposed to add to section 8 the following:

Provided, That this shall not authorize the use of such forces at a time or in a manner that would make their employment an act of war.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, where is that to be added?
Mr. CUMMINS. To section 8.
Mr. FLETCHER. At the end of that section?
Mr. CUMMINS. At the end of that section.
Mr. President, I have no objection to the use of the Army and Navy in the execution of our laws, if they are not used in such a manner as to constitute an act of war. Before our military forces are used in that way I think Congress ought to give authority for doing it. The Constitution has very wisely reserved to Congress the exclusive authority to declare war; and I am not willing to give the President, by general language, the right to use our military forces in such a way as would be an act of war. This, though not in terms, not technically, would in fact be a declaration of war.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that the words "as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter" limit the power of the President and restrict him to such uses of the land and naval forces?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not, because if the arms and munitions were on a foreign ship and our Navy were used to capture the foreign ship, and the President were authorized to use the Navy under such circumstances, that would be carrying out the purposes of the chapter; and I do not want, myself, to give the President the power to use our armed forces to capture the ship of a foreign nation under such circumstances as would make the capture an act of war. That is all my amendment protects us from.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the language which is used in this law is exactly the same language that was used in the former statute that was passed during our late unpleasantness with Spain. The President was authorized in a joint resolution passed in 1898 to selze munitions of war; and just the same language is used here that was used there. I do not see how any act of war could be committed by the President in seizing these munitions. Of course, I am as much opposed as anybody to the President having the power, either directly or indirectly, to declare war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the act to which the Senator refers was a temporary act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; it expired in two years.

Mr. CUMMINS. And it applied to war. This act does not apply to a state of war at all. It applies to peace as well as war; and under it a friendly nation might find its ships seized by one of our naval vessels.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or its citizens. Mr. CUMMINS. Or, of course, its citizens. Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose you should li

Suppose you should limit the President;

what would be done?

Mr. CUMMINS. I only exclude the President from those circumstances in which to use the Army and Navy would be an act of war.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he had to seize these munitions, if it was his duty to do so, would he have to call Congress together and get resolutions passed to allow him to make the seizure when he has to seize the munitions to-morrow or the next day? Would he have to come to Congress to get authority?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina hardly carries out his first assurance. He said he did not want the President to commit an act of war. That is all that I am protecting the country against. I do not think the President ought to take our fleet and capture a merchant fleet of a friendly nation because that fleet might be transporting munitions of war against a proclamation of embargo. I think that before we are plunged into war Congress ought to act, and my whole proposition is to preserve to Congress that constitutional authority.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not believe that a seizure under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Iowa could be interpreted as being an act of war. That act would not be conceived in any hostility at all toward the nation from whose vessel the arms and munitions might be taken. It would not be construed to be an act of war.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask to have the amendment stated again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary. On page 24, line 24, after the word "chapter" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That this shall not authorize the use of such forces at a time or in a manner that would make their employment an act of war. Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas

and nays

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to have the yeas and nays called now. I doubt whether we have a quorum. Just let it be put to a viva voce vote. I think it will be carried.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I believe in this amendment, and I believe it is vital. I am not going to be rushed off my feet by the hysteria that seems to be in the atmosphere.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just accept it.
Mr. CUMMINS. If it is accepted, very well.
Mr. OVERMAN. I say just put it to a vote.
Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I am perfectly willing to do that, if it is understood that it is to be carried.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it is not so understood with me, because I shall very vigorously vote against it and protest against it

Mr. OVERMAN. I was ready to have a vote taken, but I did not want the yeas and nays called.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the matter be passed over for the present, and taken up again before we—
Mr. FALL. If it is open for discussion, I want to be heard

Mr. OVERMAN. It is open for discussion. Let us go on and discuss the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is very important to finish these bills. We have appropriation bills and the revenue bill to be considered

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, this is a general subject that is being dealt with in this chapter; and the section which is objected to gives the President of the United States the authority to enforce the law on this general subject. If he does not have any such authority, there is nothing at all to be gained by dealing with the subject generally. From the very fact of his being empowered to use the land and naval forces to enforce the law of the United States here, I can not conceive how he could use them so as not to give an opportunity for any other nation to declare war if it wanted to do so. A declaration of war may be founded on nothing. An act of war may be committed by a neutral; but it does not follow that the act of war should be followed by a declaration of war even upon the part of a neutral.

The whole object of this is to preserve the neutrality of the United States. There are some portions of these consolidated bills, if I may call them such, of which I do not approve, and some portions of them of which I do approve. It has been known for years, Mr. President, that the neutrality of the United States were absolutely defective. It has been well known that they should have been codified and improved to keep up with the times, with the course of nations, with the declaration of London, with the agreements of The Hague tribunal, with the modern rules of law as modified, and that we have not done so.

The very statute of 1912 to which the Senator calls attention followed an old law or resolution which was adopted at the time of the Spanish War, which was not a neutrality statute at all, and still it is called a neutrality statute. Upon that we built in 1912, again, another portion of the neutrality law. The act upon which this resolution of 1912 is based, instead of being a neutrality statute, was a war measure for the protection of the United States, then at war with Spain. It was not a neutrality measure at all.

These are neutrality measures. The United States can not permit the equipping and arming of a vessel within its harbors, for instance, to proceed against another nation with which the United States is itself at peace, without committing an act of war. It becomes the duty of the United States, by whatever means may lie within its power, to prevent the equipping of that expedition, whether by land force or whether by naval force. Otherwise, it gives cause immediately for a declaration of war. If we do not use the proper means to stop a ship which is sailing from one of our ports in violation of our neutrality statutes and the ordinary rules of war, we give cause for a declaration of war against us.

This is simply modifying or getting into proper shape the neutrality laws, filling up the gaps, and providing a method by which the President of the United States can enforce the neutrality laws and keep this country out of war. If a ship sails to sea carrying munitions, or an armed expedition starts from the United States against a country with which this country is at peace, how is the President of the United States going to stop it except by ordering the armed land or naval forces to seize it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

Mr. FALL. Pardon me; just a moment. Now, suppose that in attempting to seize such a ship it becomes necessary for him to sink it, and suppose that the flag of a foreign nation is flying over the ship at that time? Suppose that this expedition, equipped here, chooses to resist the attempt of the President of the United States to perform his duty as a neutral? Suppose that it resists and he sinks the ship? Is that an act of war, when you are firing upon another flag? You prohibit him from going to that length.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will ask the Senator from New Mexico whether it would be an act of war or not?

Mr. FALL. It would be a justification for a declaration of war upon the part of the other nation if she chose so to consider it. The Senator must know that in time of war all ordinary rules by which you judge the ordinary conduct of nations or individuals are done away with.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that it would be an act of war if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa became a law.

Mr. FALL. Precisely. The Senator has assisted me very materially in the point which I was attempting to make. Then you are tying the President's hands. You are depriving him of the means with which he can preserve the neutrality of this Government and protect it against a declaration of war by a foreign nation.

I think the Senator on a little more mature reflection will himself conclude that the adoption of his amendment would be very disastrous. It would be much better—better by far, Mr. President—to reject chapter 9 altogether than to adopt this amendment to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think it would be unwise to adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa. This is a domestic law. We provide by it that when the President has forbidden the shipment or exportation of arms, and an attempt is made to violate the proclamation of the President, he may seize or any person authorized may seize and detain the arms and munitions of war. When that is done, the President is proceeding under the provision of the Constitution which authorizes him to see to it that the laws of the United States are executed. He may call upon any civil force that may be necessary—any number of United States marshals, deputy marshals, or special officers that may be necessary—to execute that law or any other law. Now, because that force may not be sufficient in some given case, we desire to authorize him further, for the purpose of executing a law of the United States, to utilize the Army and the Navy as well as the civil officers, the United States marshals, and their deputies.

How can it be possible that an act of the President in executing, under the terms of the Constitution, a law of the United States can be an act of war? It might result in war, and so might any act of the President; but we must proceed upon the theory that the President in executing the law-this law or any other law of the country-will act discreetly. I think there would be danger of embarrassing him by a provision of this kind. How shall he interpret it? If he finds that he is going to take action that will offend some foreign country and may result in a declaration of war on their part, conceivably he may be justified in going ahead, nevertheless. It is a matter that ought to be left to him, and about which we ought not to attempt in advance to tie his hands.

I think it would be an extremely unfortunate thing to adopt this amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not get much encouragement for this amendment, and I understand perfectly well the reason. I do not believe that any power could now be proposed for delegation to an Executive that would not receive the approval of a great many people. The argument just made by the Senator from Utah answers itself, as it seems to me. He said that the employment of the Army and the Navy in pursuance of this law would not be an act of war, and I think he is quite right about that in most instances. There is, however, Mr. President, such a thing as an act of war as distinguished from a trespass or an unlawful seizure or a misdirected effort of our civil or military forces.

I am not prepared to define the phrase "an act of war," but it is nevertheless fairly well understood in the literature of the subject. If in order to enforce a law of the United States it becomes necessary for this country to commit an act of war, I think the order of Congress should precede it.

I do not mean, now, an act which may bring about war. There are many things that we may do lawfully which will so provoke another country that the other country may declare war against us. That we can not avoid; but in the execution of our law or in the attempted execution of our law to commit the act of war it seems to me is a situation upon which Congress ought to act. You might just as well say to the sheriff, "If you find it necessary in order to enforce the act, kill your prisoner." Nobody thinks of giving that power to the sheriff, although the sheriff may have power, properly so, in making an arrest to take the life of the prisoner.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that it is any more than the right to protect property?

Mr. CUMMINS. The President has that authority now. He has the authority to summon the posse comitatus to enforce the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. This authorizes him to use the naval forces to carry out the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has authority to use the naval forces of the United States to execute the law. Does the Senator from North Carolina dispute that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he has the authority to execute the civil law, and that is all this does.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I can not quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina. If that is all that this does, it would not be an act of war. No one questions the right of the Presi-dent to use the military forces of the country to preserve the peace. No one questions the right. Do you doubt that? No one questions the right of the President to use a regiment of soldiers that a mail train may move. Do you doubt that?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator doubt that we have a right to say the President shall enforce the neutrality laws by the Army and Navy?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt about it whatever; but if the President uses the Army and the Navy in the absence of any statute in prosecuting a war against a foreign nation, then he violates his duty.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me-

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator forget or overlook the distinction between an act of war and a cause for war?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. FALL. Does not the Senator think that the Executive of this country can commit an act without an act of Congress that you can call an act of war without giving a cause for war?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I think he can give a cause for war, but I have supposed that there were certain things that were acts of war and were so recognized in all international obliga-For instance, suppose the President would take our Navy and bombard Habana, I suppose that would be an act of war. What does the Senator from New Mexico think about it?

Mr. FALL. Under certain circumstances it would not be a cause for war as recognized by every international law writer who has ever written on the subject and as recognized by all the tribunals which have ever passed upon the subject. It depends upon the circumstances under which the bombardment is carried on. That constitutes the distinction between an act of war and a cause for war.

Mr. CUMMINS. My amendment does not suggest cause for

Mr. FALL. No; but it prohibits the act for war.
Mr. CUMMINS. It prohibits the act of war. I do not want the President of the United States to take our Navy to Habana or anywhere else and bombard a foreign city or capture a foreign ship unless the law in view of the situation authorized him to do it.

Mr. FALL. Yet in the past history of this country the different Executives of this country have done just exactly those things in over fifty instances, without bringing on war and under circumstances which invariably have been declared as not constituting a cause for war.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not as well versed in this great subject as is the Senator from New Mexico, of course, and he is undoubtedly right about it; but most of those instances are instances that I would have liked to prevent. I have known since my advent into public life the use of our Navy in a way that brought shame to the cheeks of every liberty loving citizen of our country. I am not speaking about this administration more than those which preceded it. I know how we have used the Army and the Navy, and especially the Navy, and so does every reading man. We have used it in a way that if the Nation which was the object of our power were strong apparent. which was the object of our power were strong enough we would have been at war constantly for the last 16 years; there would have been no moment of peace if the weaker countries in the south had had the military power that Great Britain or Germany has. So far as I am concerned, I do not want the President to use the great strength of our Army and Navy in that I can describe it in no better terms than by committing an act of war.

Mr. OVERMAN. I fail to see that he can commit an act of war under this chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then my amendment will do no harm, Mr. OVERMAN. I think it would.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President— Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. Mr. GALLINGER. I have been detained from the Chamber. I am sorry I have missed this interesting debate. I assume the position the Senator takes, as I have heard it, is that the bombardment of Vera Cruz by our Navy was practically an act of

Mr. CUMMINS. It was an act of war, and the President of the United States came to Congress in order to get approval

Mr. GALLINGER. Had it been Germany or Great Britain in place of Mexico, beyond doubt we would have been in war, would we not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That has nothing to do with this act at all, to authorize the use of the Navy to maintain neutrality.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a ques-on? Assuming the act to be constitutional, within our right and our power, and a valid act, does the Senator believe the carrying out or the execution of that act could in any event be an act of war?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me the only possible instance where there could grow out of it an act of war would be in doing something ultra vires, something beyond the power granted by the act, which might grow and develop into some movement to enforce the act; but have we a right to assume and are we justified in assuming that the President would deliberately commit an act of war?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not assume that. Mr. President, I am judging this question not by any confidence or want of confidence that I may have in any official. I do not think that it is a good way in which to test the merits of a law to say that it will not be abused by a particular man. Even granting that the present Chief Executive would use the power wisely and discreetly-and I have no doubt that he would-he is not the only President who will have the right to use the power as time goes on. It may be that I am all wrong with regard to what constitutes an act of war. It may be that there is not any difference between the peaceful execution of our power and the warlike execution of our power. If it may be that if we wanted to get back a citizen of the United States who had taken refuge in Germany, we might take our battleships to a German port, capture the port, and take our Army and go into the interior of the country and arrest him and bring him back. According to the view that seems to be held, that would be a perfectly valid thing to do, and we would commit no act of war in doing it, for we have a right to the return of our citizen under existing treaties.

Just so with the exportation of arms upon which an embargo has been laid. We have a right to lay the embargo, and if the law is violated we have a right to punish the person who violates it, and we have a right to capture if we can the vessel or vehicle, whatever it may be, that is bearing the arms away to the forbidden place. But there are circumstances under which we would have no right to take them with our Army and our

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were so circumstanced at Vera Cruz. The Senator will recall that the ostensible object of sending our fleet to Vera Cruz was to prevent the landing of a German ship with arms on board. Admiral Mayo could have taken care of himself and his gunboat without any trouble at all, but our fleet went down there to arrest the delivery of arms and ammunition to a Government with which he was, at least, ill disposed.

Mr. FALL. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan what he thought of the action of this Government two years prior, or a little more, in bombarding Corinto in Nicaragua?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it was very reprehensible. Mr. FALL. I thought the Senator was one of those who advocated that action.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it was very reprehensible, and I should like to go just a step further. Our Navy has been employed to take away the officials of a friendly Government and imprison them against their will and against the wishes of the Government they represented without any authority whatever of law

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not profess to be master of the subject of international law, on this phase at any rate, but I do know that if we are to have peace instead of war no executive officer ought to have the right to use our Army and Navy in an act of war without the specific authority of Congress, Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat? We have repeatedly passed laws providing that the President of the United States in the execution of them might utilize the land and naval forces in the execution of our domestic laws. That has been done repeatedly, covering a period of more than a hundred years. Has the Sena-tor in mind any instance whenever any such qualification as he proposed here has ever been put upon one of those provisions?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no recollection of any such language.

The situation, however, was entirely different.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me call the Senator's attention to a few instances, and there is a large number of them. 1989 of the Revised Statutes provides that-

It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process issued under any of the preceding provisions, or as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of the provisions of this title.

That was the title with reference to civil rights. Now, in another section, 2460, the provision is

The President is authorized to employ so much of the land and naval forces of the United States as may be necessary effectually to prevent the felling, cutting down, or other destruction of the timber of the United States in Florida, and to prevent the transportation or carrying away any such timber as may be already felled or cut down; and to take such other and further measures as may be deemed advisable for the preservation of the timber of the United States in Florida.

Those two instances, it is true, were confined to matters that could not by any possibility involve us with any other nation, but we have authorized it in dealing with other countries. For example, in section 5288 of the Revised Statutes, there is the following provision:

It shall be lawful for the President or such person as he shall empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart the United States in all cases in which, by the laws of nations or the treaties of the United States, she ought not to remain within the United States.

There is a statute which was passed in 1818, nearly a hundred years ago, and as I said, there are repeated instances of that kind. It never seems to have been thought necessary heretofore to attach to them any such limitation as the Senator from Iowa presents, and no difficulty has arisen in the past. I can not see myself that there is the slightest danger of any difficulty arising in the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, It might be said that no great difficulty would arise if we would confer all governmental power on the President. I really think at times we would be much better governed if we were not to interpose any authority on the part of Congress. It is rather an obstinate body and not at all certain in its results. But after all, I am afraid of the one-man power, I always have been, and I hope I always will be. I do not intend by my vote or voice to give one man any more authority than is necessary to enable him to fairly and reasonably execute our laws.

The debate has created a doubt in my mind with respect to the phraseology of my amendment, although it has deepened my conviction with regard to its general merit. At this moment I intend to withdraw the amendment, with the consent of the Senate, in order that I may if possible redraft it in more appropriate terms, terms that will be more certain to reach the end I have in view.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection.
Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I suggested a question to the Senator. I think there may be some confusion possibly as to what act of war justifies a declaration of war. I do not think there is any question that it would not be settled by any international law or authority as to the proposition which I am going to advance.

The attack of the naval forces of this country upon Vera Cruz was an act of war, as it was made for a reason that, in my opinion, was a cause of war. Had it been made for the purpose, as I urged upon the Senate that they should so declare, of protecting American citizens, while it would have been an act of war. it would not have been a cause of war. The bombardment of Greytown fifty-odd years ago was an act of war; it was even protested against by Great Britain, under whose protection the Mosquito Coast was at that time; but it was not a cause of war, because it was for the protection of American citizens. It was in pursuance of our duty as a Government to our own people. The marching of the armed forces of the United States into Peking was an act of war; it was not a cause of war. The attack by the naval forces of the United States upon Japan in 1854 was an act of war; it was not a cause of war, because it was in pursuance of our constitutional duty to protect our seamen and our citizens against piratical and unwarranted attacks.

The President of the United States now has a duty to perform in maintaining the neutrality of the United States. Under all the laws of war and under all international law, recognized by every civilized and semicivilized nation, a country such as ours must pursue certain methods to preserve its neutrality or it gives a cause for war to another country. The President of the United States here is authorized to use the naval forces of the United States, if, in his judgment, he thinks it is necessary to preserve the neutrality of the United States. It would be far better that he should go even to the extent of committing an act of war in preserving neutrality, than that he should give a cause for war by failure to preserve neutrality. That is exactly the distinction here.

In the event it were attempted now to arm and to munition a ship for Germany or for Great Britain in one of the ports of this country for use against Germany or Great Britain, as the case might be, and we permitted the arming and the sailing of that vessel, it would be a cause for war upon the part of the nation whose commerce that vessel proposed to harry. If that vessel escapes beyond the 3-mile limit and raises the flag of Great Britain, and the President of the United States, ordering our naval forces to pursue her, fires upon that vessel bearing the flag of Great Britain, he commits an act of war, but he does not give cause for war, because the vessel has violated our neutrality laws, and under ordinary international law per-taining to war and the duty of neutrals; if he did not pursue it but allowed that vessel under the British flag to proceed on its way and to commit any act against Germany, the President would give cause for war, and a declaration of war on the part of the nation under whose flag the vessel was sailing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator. Mr. CUMMINS. Either the Senator from New Mexico or myself totally misunderstands the proposed statute with which we are dealing. It has nothing to do with neutrality. We may forbid the exportation of arms and munitions of war to any other country if we care to do so, but this is not confined to time of war; it is just as operative in time of peace. It does not deal with our neutral obligations, but it deals with a situation in which we have by statute authorized the President to forbid the export of arms and munitions.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, we may, in any terms that we choose, by statute constitute as a portion of our neutrality laws an embargo act against the shipment of arms and munitions from this country. That would then become, if passed for the preservation of neutrality, a portion of our neutrality statutes. The chapter to which this section 8 is attached is:

To authorize the seizure, detention, and condemnation of arms and munitions of war in course of exportation or designed to be exported or used in violation of the laws of the United States, together with the vessels or vehicles in which the same are contained.

That is exactly what I am speaking of. In 1798 it became necessary for the Congress of the United States to pass a neutrality act to prevent exactly this state of affairs, and we did enact it, and it is still a portion of our law. It has always been defective. We found it so whenever we undertook to enforce it. A vessel sails from New York loaded down with arms. As soon as it gets beyond the 3-mile limit it proceeds to arm itself. It is prepared to do so. It has the guns with which to arm itself and with which to harry the commerce of another nation. Although the vessel when it leaves the harbor may not be armed, if we pass an act prohibiting its sailing with such arms on board as may enable it to arm itself and become a piratical cruiser, how would you enforce the law except by the naval forces of the United States? In the event it raises the flag of a foreign country while we are in pursuit of it, immediately after it has passed beyond our 3-mile limit, and we fire upon it, it is an act of war, but nevertheless we should not allow it to proceed. It should be in the power of the President to catch that vessel as it approaches the port for which it is headed, although he may have to pursue it 3,000 miles across the Atlantic Ocean, because that enables him to keep this great Nation out of war.

These are not war measures; these are measures to preserve the peace; and I had rather place more power in the hands of the President of the United States to preserve the peace of this great Nation than to make war; and if it is necessary for him to commit an act of war, as it is whenever he uses the naval or the land forces of the United States to protect an American citizen, I am thankful, sir, that we have such a history behind us as to justify the Congress of the United States in placing in his hands the weapons with which he should pursue that object. I am grateful to know that the acts of the Presidents of the United States, even without the direct authority here conferred by Congress, have been approved by history and by the people of the United States, and have invariably resulted in the prevention rather than the bringing on of war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Iowa has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Iowa has withdrawn the amendment. I ask now that the reading of the proposed substitute be resumed, and I should like to get through with the reading this evening, if possible.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I introduce an amendment

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I introduce an amendment and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and called up in the morning

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rather think, however, that we can pass on it now. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The Secretary. On page 32, line 2, after the word "States" and before the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the Governor of the Panama Canal, with the approval of the President, shall make all necessary rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act in the territory and waters of the Canal Zone within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have here a long letter from the Secretary of War showing the importance of adopting this amendment to give him authority in the matter. I will not take the time to have it read to-night unless some Senator desires to have it read, but ask that it may be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to. The PRESIDING OFFICER.

Without objection, the letter will be published in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 12, 1917.

Hon. Lee S. Overman,
Committee on Judiciary, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Committee on Judiciary, United States Senate,

Washington, D. C.

Sir: My attention has been called to the bill (S. 6795) with reference to regulating the conduct of vessels in the ports and waters of the United States in case of actual or threatened war, insurrection, or invasion, or threatened disturbance of the international relations of the United States, which was reported by you to the Senate with an amendment on the 8th instant.

The amended bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized and empowered to make rules and regulations governing the conduct of certain vessels in the territorial waters of the United States, and that if any officers in charge of such vessels shall refuse or fall to comply with such regulations or rules, such vessels, together with their tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture to the United States in the same manner as merchandise is forfeited for violation of the customs-revenue laws. Section 5 of the amended bill provides that the term "United States" as used therein shall include the Canal Zone.

If this bill as it now reads should become a law it would mean that the Secretary of the Treasury would have jurisdiction in the matter of regulating the conduct of vessels in the ports and waters of the Canal Zone. This would be undesirable, as it has always been the policy of the Government that all canal matters should be handled through one head. All legislation for the canal has consistently conferred authority only upon the President for the maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and already certain Executive orders and regulations have been issued to carry into effect the provisions of these acts. There has, therefore, been a desire evinced in the legislation to control the canal as one unit. It is believed that all canal matters should be centralized under one head, and not divided up for supervision and direction among the different departments, where they might otherwise property so.

In so far as the continental United States is concerned, the Secretary of the Treasury has an organization which would enable him to enforce the provisions of bill S. 6795. The Treasury Department, however, has no organization in the Canal Zone, and the ports of the Canal Zone, by act of Congress (33 U. S. Stats., 843), are treated as foreign ports. The Governor of the Panama Canal, however, has under his supervision and control an organization which can carry into effect the provisions of the bill in question, to be administered in conjunction with the power already conferred upon the governor to protect and operate the canal. Under these circumstances it is urged that the proposed amendment to the pending bill be amended by inserting a proviso at the end of section 5, line 17, page 5, reading substantially as follows:

"Provided, That the Governor of the Panama Canal, with the approval of the President, shall make all necessary rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this act in the territory and waters of the Canal Zone within the jurisdiction of the United States."

I am firmly of the opinion that if the bill is amended as indicated above it will simplify the administration of the United States forces.

Very respectfully,

Newton D. Baker,

Secretary of War.

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Tuesday, Feb. 13, 1917.] GOVERNOR OF CANAL ZONE GIVEN BROAD AUTHORITY—PRESIDENT SIGNS
ORDER ACCORDING UNLIMITED POWER IN REGULATING IMMIGRATION

An Executive order designed to exclude spies and other undesirable persons from the Panama Canal Zone and giving Col. Harding, governor of the zone, virtually unlimited authority in regulating immigration there, has been signed by President Wilson.

The text of the document has not been made public, but it was described to-day as containing broad provisions, under which the governor would be practically unrestricted in preventing entry of persons who "would be a menace to the general welfare."

Provision also is made under which the governor may expel from the Canal Zone and deport therefrom any person convicted of a criminal offense in the grade of felony, or whose presence, in the judgment of the governor, would tend to create public disorder or in any manner impede the prosecution of the work of opening the canal or its maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Sec. 2. Whenever it appears that the vessel is not entitled to clearance or whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that the additional statements under oath required in the foregoing section of this chapter are false, the Collector of Customs for the district in which such vessel is located is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to review by the Secretary of the Treasury, to refuse clearance to any vessel; domestic or foreign, for which clearance is required by law, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command regard to search warrants.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object to that. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, take us into Thy kind care and lead us by Thy counsels through the turmoil, contentions, and unholy strife which have entered into the world, dethroning reason, robbing men of conscience, making them veritable fiends, rendering life and all its sacred rights void. Interpose, we beseech Thee, Thy holy influence and bring order out of chaos, peace out of war; that brotherly love and good will may prevail, and righteousness have its sway through Jesus Christ our Lord.

STATEMENT.

There were 137 differences in this bill as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate. The Senate receded on 104 of these differences and the House on 33. The bill as it passed the House changed all of the dates in the measure, so that the appropriations will become available one year later than provided in the Senate bill. This change, together with inconsequential changes in verbiage and punctuation, was responsible for a very large part of the differences in the two bills. The House provision, making the first appropriations available in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, instead of June 30, 1917, was retained in the bill. There were three important differences in the measures passed by the two Houses-the provision in the House bill that home economics share in the fund provided for the trades and industries, the membership of the Federal board and its assistants, and the requirements for the acceptance of the act by the States.

The measure as it passed the House included the field of home economics in the appropriations under the trade and industrial funds. The Senate receded from its objections to this provision.

As there are six States (Alabama, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, and Virginia) whose legislatures do not meet this year, this fact having been brought to the attention of the conferees by Senators and Representatives from those States, the conferees have endeavored to so shape section 5 of the bill that it will be possible for these States to accept the provisions of this act through their governors until their legislatures shall have had time to act.

The measure as it passed the Senate provided that the Federal board for vocational education be composed of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, and the board was authorized to select an advisory board of seven members. A number of experts and specialists were also authorized to assist the board.

The measure as it passed the House provided for the appointment by the President of a representative of manufacturing interests, a representative of commercial interests other than manufacturing, a representative of labor, and a representative of agriculture, to act with the United States Commissioner of Education as a board of five to administer the act, and provided for the employment of such assistants as might be necessary.

The provision agreed to by the conferees is a blending of the two proposals, so that the new system is to be linked with the Government by the designation of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education as ex officio members of the board, and the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a representative of the manufacturing and commercial interests, a representative of the agricultural interests, and a representative of labor, to act with them as members of the board.

The House receded from its amendments to the bill, which had the effect of merely "authorizing" the appropriations, and the appropriations are definitely made in the bill as reported from conference.

> DUDLEY M. HUGHES. W. W. RUCKER, CALEB POWERS, Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Other than the change in the conference report providing for direct appropriation rather than authorization of appropriations and for the change of the personnel of the Federal board, will the gentleman inform the House where the bill as agreed to differs from the House bill?

Mr. HUGHES. I will take pleasure in giving the gentleman my understanding of it. I will say to the gentleman that the provision agreed to by the conference is a blending of the two proposals, the proposals of the House and the Senate, so that the new system is to be linked with the Government by designation of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Com-merce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education as a member ex officio.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am advised as to that. I have read the statement, but I am inquiring what other changes besides the direct appropriation and change of personnel does the conference report differ from the House bill?

Mr. HUGHES. Well, sir; I wish to say there were 137 differences.

Mr. STAFFORD. But will the gentleman specify the main particulars wherein the conference report differs from the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. HUGHES. There were three. There were three important differences in the measures passed by the two Houses. The provision in the House bill that home economics share in the fund provided for the trades and industries, the membership of the Federal board and its assistants, and the requirements of the acceptance of the act by the States.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire particularly whether the amounts appropriated for teachers' salaries differ in any wise in the conference report than in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. HUGHES. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the same restrictions and limitations are carried in the conference report as to the expenditure of this appropriation for salaries as were carried in the House bill ?

Absolutely so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, as to the personnel of the Federal board. I notice the civilian members are a minority. Did the conferees consider the question of having the three civilians so as to determine the policy of the board rather than leaving it to these Cabinet officers and the Commissioner of Education to control the policy?

Mr. HUGHES. We certainly considered that and discussed it for 10 days and finally we came to a conference agreement that we adopted, just that which I have read, namely, three the Secretaries and the Commissioner of Education and three citizens of the United States to be appointed by the President.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the change in direct appropriation rather than authorization, as carried in the House bill, the gentleman realizes that the conferees have departed from the more or less established policy in providing direct appropria-tions for these activities when the fact, as apparent from the very reading of the bill, is that the appropriations may not be needed; certainly they will not be needed in the first year's operation, because the appropriations are contingent largely upon the action of the respective States. Will the gentleman inform the House the reason why the conferees agreed to direct appropriations in these respective amounts, which may not be used, rather than leaving to Congress to pass upon and determine from time to time the amounts as in their judgment they thought advisable in carrying out the purposes of the

Mr. HUGHES. The Committee on Education, on the part of the House, has no right to make an appropriation; all that they could do was to authorize an appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Did not the Committee on Education report the bill to the House making direct appropriations, and was it not amended in the House?

Mr. HUGHES. No; we just authorized it, as I understand. Mr. FESS. The Senate amended it.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the committee had authority to report a direct appropriation, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House why the conferees receded from their position, other than that they did not have authority—though the gentleman from Illinois said they did have authority for it-what is the reason the conferees departed from the established policy of making authoriza-tions and provided for a direct appropriation of the amount?

Mr. HUGHES. We did that from the very fact that we had to make appropriations in order to get the money, and realizing we should have to appropriate the money, when it was put in conference we wanted to correct that mistake

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman realizes many of these amounts that will be appropriated under this bill will not be used, and in bills of similar character we have merely proauthorization, leaving to Congress thereafter to appropriate the necessary amounts so as to have control of the expenditures in case these funds were wisely and properly expended under the provisions of the enabling act.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin we had that under discussion and discussed it for 10 days or 2 weeks, and we felt it was wise to strike out the word "authorize" and insert therein "shall be appropriated."

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, the gentleman realizes that Congress surrenders control of the purse strings as to the amounts as carried in this bill by so doing?

Mr. HUGHES. The money has to be appropriated sooner or later and they will not use the money until they are forced to do it and it is required.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the appropriation would have an effect of getting action and also meet the requirements of the

Mr. HUGHES I will say that the Federal board has authority to control it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only partially.
Mr. HUGHES. I think absolutely.
Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman, or, rather, to direct his attention to the second paragraph of section 10. tion 16, page 8, of the conference report, which reads as follows:

If any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States, and if the Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

I would like to inquire if it is purposed to make the Congress of the United States an umpire in controversies between the Federal board of vocational education and the various State boards of education of the Union?

Mr. HUGHES. On what page is that? Mr. WALSH. It is on page 8 and in the last paragraph of section 16. And to further inquire how this appeal is to be made to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HUGHES. If any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States; and if the Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury. My impression is there was no use of that; but, anyhow, it was insisted that it be placed in this bill from the fact that they could refer this and bring it before the Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Well, how are the State boards going to bring it before the Congress? In what shape?

Mr. HUGHES. The State boards, I apprehend, will not bring it before the Congress

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says the State boards may appeal.

Mr. HUGHES. Unless they feel that they have not had the proper consideration by the Federal board. Then, in that event, it is admissible that they should bring it before the Congress

Mr. WALSH. That is to be done by a bill or a resolution, is it?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I think so; undoubtedly.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the Mr. HUGHES. Certainly. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me two minutes?
Mr. HUGHES. Certainly; yes, sir.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this conference report will undoubtedly be adopted and ought to be adopted, for the purpose of the bill is good; and yet I think we should not adopt it without some one emphasizing the fact that we are, in making permanent appropriations in the bill, extending a very unwise and, I think, vicious practice, making appropriations of large sums that may not be used, making appropriations which, together with other continuing appropriations, lay heavy burdens about which Congress has nothing to say. In the passing of the years this leads to a condition under which large sums of money in the Treasury may be obligated which may never of money in the Treasury may be obligated which may never be used and under which it is impossible for Congress to keep track in a businesslike way of Federal expenditures. It is a most unfortunate, a very unbusinesslike way of legislating and appropriating, in my opinion. If it were possible, if there was any hope of remedying that situation by so doing, the conference report ought to be voted down. I assume there is no hope of remedying that situation, and therefore the conference report will undoubtedly be adopted.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but I have only two minutes.
Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] said a moment ago that the original bill made the actual appropriation. At the moment I thought he was mistaken. The original bill as introduced by the commission simultaneously in the Senate and in the House did make the appropriation, but our Committee on Education in making up the bill cut out the appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand; and after the committee came to consider the matter they felt that was not a wise and proper thing to do, and so they changed the bill?

Mr. FESS. Making an authorization rather than an appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. In conference the permanent appropriation has been made, unfortunately, and I believe will become the law.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is the hope.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes? Mr. HUGHES. All right. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] that I agree there is not any more vicious system which can be adopted by Congress than a general system of permanent appropriations. To lay aside by a legislative act a certain sum of money arbitrarily each year for a specific purpose, to be expended by some administrative department or some executive officer without any accounting to Congress or any control over it by Congress, or any way of reaching any temporary evils in the expenditure except by repeal of the law, is a most vicious plan. Congress has set its face recently—possibly not recently, but certainly it sets its face now—against a continuance of permanent appropriations. Yet I can not fully agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in their criticism of this particular bill.

This bill enters upon an entirely different plan of Federal appropriation from what we have been accustomed to. It follows very closely the road law. Whether we ought to cooperate in this way with the States or not is not the question under discussion. We have decided that we will. If we are going to engage in these activities on a half-and-half basis with the States, it is perfectly apparent to my mind that the States must know in advance what they are to count on in the way of Federal And I am unable to see how the State can adjust its own activities to the Federal aid unless it knows that the Federal aid will amount to a definite and fixed sum every year. Now, that is the thing that prevailed in my mind in the road law, and this law follows in a general way the road law. I can not see how the State law is expected to spend its money and to provide the channels and avenues and facilities through which it can be spent and to do the work which is contemplated here, and undertake such a program unless it knows as a matter of certainty what the Federal Government is to appropriate.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment.

Now, suppose it was a matter on each appropriation bill how much Congress would give toward a specific object or possibly how much it would give toward a particular State or perhaps the time when the bill would go into operation which contained the appropriation. I can see how it would be almost fatal to the activities of the State under such a plan.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon]

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman does not contend that by any legislation enacted in this bill or in the road law that Congress could not refuse at any time it saw fit to appropriate?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly Congress could repeal the law or strike out the appropriation. But we are at least to that extent.

to make an appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has discussed to some extent what I had in my mind. Does not the gentleman think the States would be reasonably and sufficiently assured under the law which provided for a certain appropriation annually?

Congress would not fail to make the appropriation unless there were some exceedingly good reasons for withholding the appropriation.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I think it gets back to the whole question of whether we ought to cooperate with the States on this half-and-half basis. As I say, that question has been decided, and it is not here for discussion. If we are to cooperate with the States, I think it incumbent upon us to set aside a fixed amount for that purpose; and I do not see how we can vary it from year to year, according to the sentiment of Congress in that year, as to whether any States or any particular State should be spending the money wisely or unwisely. I do not think that will be practicable.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.
Mr. HUGHES. I yield, Mr. Speaker, five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, legislation that is not embodied in material results so that we can see it in a concrete way is not very enthusiastically supported in any legislative body, while legislation that is embodied in results that everybody can see appeals to the legislator as well as voter immediately.

Most of our activity here is absorbed in the latter sort. am going to vote for the national-defense bills, which will entail an expenditure of at least three-quarters of a billion dollars this year, and I will do it without hesitancy. I think that the country is justified in so doing. I need not here specify my reasons for this decision. But here is a bit of legislation that is not destructive, not in the interest of defensive equipment against war or its effects, but constructive. It is enlisting the talents of head and hand as well as of heart and proposes to organize the spiritual forces of the country to ulti-mately materialize in real achievement. I think it is one of the most important pieces of legislation that this or any other Congress can enact. I believe that in the future years, when the legitimate results of this legislation shall be properly appreciated, the people who have been identified with this constructive legislation will have reason to feel fortunate for the perpetuity of our institutions. It proceeds upon the conviction that the safest, as well as wisest, essentials of a nation's welfare lies in the conservation of the country's spiritual forces. I want to congratulate the chairman of this committee, the Committee on Education, and the House upon the final consummation of this bit of legislation that has been before the country for years, and which is now, I believe, going to receive the almost unanimous support of both sides of the Chamber and from both ends of the Capitol. Long before I came to this body this character of legislation appealed to me. When asked by the President to go upon his Vocational Commission to investigate the needs and possibilities of vocational education I accepted the honor in the conviction that it offered a great field for good. I now rise to offer this word of congratulation and to express my approval of this legislation that is not material, but constructive, intellectually and spiritually, but which, when measured by the standard of material values alone, is most far-reaching. I congratulate the country that such is most far-reaching. I congratulate the country that such legislation has met with such universal approval from these two bodies of the American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the confer-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Georgia yield to me five minutes.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir. I yield to the gentleman five minutes

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. Mann. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on the subject of permanent appropriation. I did think, when this conference re-port was submitted, that I would do what I could to ask the House to defeat it entirely and send the conferees back and have a conference report come before the House without a permanent appropriation.

The House has always been rather jealous of the power to originate appropriations, and yet, whether it be a provision of the Constitution or not, practically we originate the appropriations. The House does the work about appropriation bills. Senate performs very necessary functions in regard to legislation, but it does not give the same attention to appropriations of money as the House gives. In recent years we have repealed most of the provisions for permanent appropriations. We used to have a permanent appropriation for the collection of customs dues, something that has to be done, and we repealed that.

Now, in this case the House passed a bill authorizing an appropriation to be made. The Senate had passed a bill making the appropriation. It is probably true and correct to say that the Committee on Education believe that under the rules of the House they had no jurisdiction to appropriate money. But, as a matter of fact, they had jurisdiction over the Senate bill, which was referred to them-full and complete jurisdiction-and they had jurisdiction to report it back making the permament appropriation. But they advised the House to simply authorize the appropriation, and we followed their advice, and if the gentlemen who are managers of the conference on the part of the House were old and experienced conferees they would be subject to severe criticism for going into conference and yielding this position of the House by not bringing the bill back to the House for consideration.

But I do not think that criticism can be made against the very excellent and honorable gentlemen who compose the conference committee and who are not long-experienced managers of conferences in behalf of the House relating to appropriations. It is true that the House has made and agreed to an appropriation, permanent in character, relating to education. I think there is also a law that was passed relating to educational aid, aid to State universities in the original Morrill Act, and afterwards the additional aid to education, and possibly the Smith-Lever Act. My recollection is that originally these propositions all provided for permanent appropriations, but I am under the impression that we now appropriate all or part of the money to the State universities and the experiment stations. But the original appropriations have run out. I am not sure. But it is the policy of the House. I do not think that any of the conferees on the part of the House ought to go into any conferences hereafter and agree to any permanent appropriation not carried in the bill as it passes the House without bringing the matter back to the House to determine. The Senate is not interested. Everybody on the outside who is interested in the proposition wants a permanent appropriation. Of course they do. They want it fixed so that nobody can ever stop the appropriation. We struck it out of the tariff commission bill. We struck it out of every proposition that has come before the House, I think, in recent years, with but two exceptions. It ought to be our policy to keep out the permanent appropriations, and it ought to be the policy of the conferees not to agree to such a proposition without first submitting it to the House. And I say this without intending to reflect at all upon the conferees.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me? Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I yield to the gentleman five minutes. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Towner] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. President, I am very sure we are all deeply appreciative of the statement made by the leader on the Republicar side. There is no question but that as a general rule his statement about the necessity of the House retaining its jurisdiction over appropriations and the hesitancy that we should always exercise upon making permanent appropriations is correct. I presume all of us approve of that in a general way. I think, however, there can be no criticism of the conferees in yielding to the Senate suggestion that in this case a permanent appropriation is entirely proper from the fact that all appropriations of a like character that have heretofore been made in regard to educational matters, such as the appropriations that have been made to the schools under the Morrill Act and subsequent enactments, and the appropriations that have been made under the provisions of the Lever bill, have been made in that form.

I believe there will be no criticism of this bill by the people of the country. Notwithstanding the extraordinary demands that are being made upon our Treasury at this time, notwithstanding the conditions that confront us, there will be practically universal approval of the passage of this bill. It is not merely because it will advance the general cause of education in this country, but it is because it will meet a specific and long-felt want and defect in our system of education.

To Members who have not given particular attention to the matter I think it will be a surprise to know how the passage of this act is looked forward to. I am frank to confess that I believe it is regarded as of exaggerated importance in many parts of the United States. However that may be, we all know that in these matters it is after all the sentimental, the psychological view that very largely carries movements of this character into successful operation. The fact that it is known that this bill has passed, notwithstanding that the appropriations made therein will be small in the beginning, will be of immense advantage in the cause of vocational education throughout the land. It will not be alone because of the practical operation of the act. We shall find that the States will multiply many times the appropriations that are made by the General Government. As time goes by we shall find that the stimulus we have given to this movement will be of immense value in the development of this branch of education, which makes not only for the intellectual advancement of the people of the country, which makes not only for the economical development of the country, but the passage of this bill will at the same time give to the cause of labor, and those things that make for the development of a sound character and an elevated conception of those vocations which we now denominate as the manual vocations, a dignity and an importance that they have never had hitherto in the minds of the people of the United States. And that, I believe, Mr. Speaker, is a consummation devoutly to be [Applause.]

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr.

Powers] three minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the conferees on the part of the House, and I want to explain our position with reference to the House bill and the Senate bill in so far as the actual making of the appropriations is concerned.

It is true that the House bill merely authorized the money to be appropriated. The bill as passed the Senate actually appropriated it. The Committee on Education of the House would have recommended the actual appropriation if it had been in our power to do so. The fact that we did not have the power to do so is the reason why it was not done. When we got into the House with our bill we could not ask its modification without modifying our own unanimous report and changing our own bill unanimously reported. We were aware of the fact that the Senate bill had actually appropriated the money. It was not our desire to give up any of the authority and power of the laid before the House for consideration.

House in the conference; but since the Senate had done what it had the power to do, and since we could not do what we wanted to do in the Committee on Education, the conferees on the part of the House very gladly consented to having the money actually appropriated rather than authorized.

This is the explanation which I desire to make. Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Abercrombie] five minutes. [Applause.]

[Mr. ABERCROMBIE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Hughes, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CORRECTION OF A RULING.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the Chair wants to correct a ruling which he has been intending to do for some time. It will be remembered that during the last session the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made a motion to reconsider a vote by which unanimous consent was granted in a certain matter. The Chair ruled that the motion to reconsider does not apply to unanimous consent. On subsequent reflection and investigation the Chair is convinced that the ruling of the Chair was incorrect and untenable, and that the motion to reconsider does apply in such cases.

The Chair makes this correction now, when no such controversy is pending, to the end that the former erroneous ruling may not go into the footnotes of the next Manual, to the misleading of Members. [Applause.]

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following concurrent resolution, and, pending such consideration, I ask for one minute to explain the purpose of the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows: House concurrent resolution 75.

House concurrent resolution 75.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 703) entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure," the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the "name" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "designate or create," in the third line of the second paragraph of section 5, as the same appears in the conference report on said bill and amendment.

Mr OLIVER Mr Speaker this concurrent resolution is in-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, have the conferees gone into that?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes; the conferees, both of the Senate and House, are fully agreed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

JUVENILE COURT.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed the bill H. R. 8348, known as the juvenile-court bill, with 76 amendments. I ask that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and that we ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 8348. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, and for other pur-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. Johnson of Kentucky, Mr. HILLIARD, and Mr. TINKHAM. AUTHORIZING INSURANCE COMPANIES AND FRATERNAL SOCIETIES TO FILE INTERPLEADERS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill H. R. 12541 be

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12541) authorizing insurance companies and fraternal beneficiary societies to file bills of interpleader, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CONFEDERATE REUNION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157), which has for its purpose making provision for the Confederate reunion in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157).

Mr. MANN, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, but I think we ought to have an opportunity to see what it is, and I hope the gentleman will postpone this, at least until later in the day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Very well, Mr. Speaker. I will withdraw my request for the present.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL DUPONT.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 205. It is the same resolution I had up once before to-day, when objection was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING]; but I understand he has since withdrawn his objection.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Texas a question or two. Is there any truth in the rumors that come to me that the proposition is to dismantle this statue and erect a memorial which will be more of a memorial to the house of Dupont or the Dupont family than it will be to the admiral?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No. Mr. Speaker; I can say that there is no truth in that rumor, at least so far as I am advised and be-Of course, I can not tell what is deep in the recesses of the minds of men; but no such thought has been spoken, und I do not think it will be, for it does not exist.

Mr. KING. Who will prepare the memorial?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It will be prepared after competition between the artists; and the bill provides that it shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts. I will say to the gentleman that an amendment is contemplated by the leader of the minority [Mr. Mann] providing that the new memorial shall not occupy more space than that now occupied by the

Mr. KING. Will the distinguished gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is there any well-defined plan on the part of the Committee on the Library to dismantle all of the statues in the city of Washington and put in their places memorial fountains?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has no such purpose in view. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution has already been I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting an additional proviso, in line 4, page 2, after the word "complete," as follows:
"Provided further, That no greater area in the said Dupont Circle shall be taken for the memerial herein authorized than the small circle now occupied by the statue of Admiral Dupont."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Slayden, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

JOSEPH BEECH.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 208, to grant citizenship to Joseph Beech, and that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 208. Is there objection?

Mr. MHLLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the geutleman if this is the same matter about which I spoke to him this morning?

Mr. BURNETT. This same resolution has been reported by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. It is for the naturalization of Joseph Beech,

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Let us have it reported. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 208) to grant citizenship to Joseph Beech. Whereas Joseph Beech has constantly been under the jurisdiction of the United States since the age of 4 years; and Whereas the said Joseph Beech is not entitled to immediate naturalization under any existing statute; and Whereas the said Joseph Beech is not a citizen of any other Government: Therefore be it Resolved, etc., That Joseph Beech be, and he is hereby, uncondi-tionally admitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two while we have a bill of this character before us. Has it been the policy of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to report many of these private naturalization resolutions in this Congress?

Mr. BURNETT. No. As I recollect it, during the 11 or 12 years of my service upon this committee the committee has reported only three.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Is this the first one in the Sixtyfourth Congress?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. MHILER of Delaware. There is a similar resolution on the House Calendar?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. This is the same resolution that is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, several years ago a Representative from Delaware, Mr. Heald, introduced a private naturalization bill, which went to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. I do not think the gentleman from Alabama was then the chairman of it. The resolution was to grant citizenship to a man who was able to fill every particular required by the law except to give the name of the ship on which he came over to this country when he was 2 years old. The records which would have supplied the information were destroyed in the Baltimore fire. That was in 1904. He has been unable to become naturalized because the United States district judge for Delaware refuses to waive that defect. Can the gentleman tell me whether a bill to grant this man naturalization would be now in order under the policy of the comniittee?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the bill that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER] refers to, but I imagine that the committee thought that the judge improperly decided that case, that it was a highly technical decision, and possibly incorrect. In cases where the committee believes there is any remedy in the courts for naturalization, it has refused to grant it through resolution or bill. In this case Mr. Campbell, the Commissioner of Naturalization, says this man has no chance without staying here five years. He came over from England when he was 4 years old, with his father. He thought his father had become a naturalized citizen. When he was 21 years of age he went off to school and remained until he was 29 years of age. He was a member of the National Guard, and as such took the oath to support and uphold the Constitution of the United States. He never offered to vote because he was sent as a missionary to China by the Methodist Episcopal Church before he had a long enough permanent residence in the place where he and his father lived to entitled him to vote. He stayed in China for many years and is now a teacher in a great university, conducted, I think, under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He came back some time ago. His people are in the district of my good friend Mr. McKenzie, of I desire to say here that I never invade the district of another Member to introduce a bill until he has been consulted. On account of the fact that our committee had jurisdiction of the matter, after consulting with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie], he said he would be very glad for me to introduce the bill and take charge of it. Mr. Beech is over here and he can not get back. There are only Japanese and English ships going to China, and they will not take him back to his school duties and his duties as a missionary.

Mr. MANN. That is, he can not get his passports?

Mr. BURNETT. They will not take him back without his passports, and he can not get his passports because he is not a naturalized citizen.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I think the amended law covers the case referred to by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I will say that, as I am informed, the district judge in Delaware refused only a year or so ago to permit the man I have in mind to become naturalized.

Mr. MANN. Then evidently the law does not cover the case. In this particular case, of course this man could get his citizenship papers by remaining continuously in this country for five years, but he is an American teacher in a Chinese university, and I think probably it is more desirable that he go to China to perform his duties than to remain here and wait for five years in order to get his papers. If we do not grant him citizenship papers he can not get back.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that the resolution be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I make a formal motion to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Alabama a question. Is nothing to be done by this man to evince his acceptance of this bill? Would it not be proper to add to it an amendment that he shall take the oath to support the Constitution?

Mr. McKENZIE. He has already done that. Mr. BURNETT. He took that oath when he became a member of the National Guard. He would have to stay here for five years to enable him to be admitted to naturalization. This resolution is for the purpose of naturalizing him so that he can return to his duties in China.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

House joint resolution 364, a similar resolution, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I rise to ask for two minutes in order to make a statement for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to extend a certain editorial in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.]

The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have been convinced and have made the statement that the executive officials who have no power to declare war are usurping the power of Congress if they take steps to lead this country toward war without consulting the Congress. It is admitted by all that Congress only has the right to declare war, therefore for that reason I have taken the position I have in regard to the matter. I also am strongly in favor of a referendum on the question of war, unless it is a question of invasion of our country or an uprising in the nature of a revolution. In other words, I believe that the men who go to the front, who shoulder the guns and whose loyalty and patriotism must be depended upon for the proper protection of the Nation should have a say as to whether or not we should become involved in a war. When war is imminent one should have the courage to stand true to one's convictions in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to continue for another minute with a view of asking unanimous consent to insert in the Record an editorial in the New York American of February 14 headed, "The people of the United States alone have the constitutional and moral right to decide war." It is refreshing and encouraging indeed to know a newspaper with a great circulation publishes

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there

The editorial is as follows:

THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES ALONE HAVE THE CONSTITUTIONAL AND MORAL RIGHT TO DECIDE WAR.

"To the Congress of the United States:

"The people of the United States are strongly opposed to war.
"So are the majority of you, who represent the people.

"And yet we stand tiptoe on the brink of war.

"Senators and Representatives, shall we tell you why the country stands on the crumbling edge of this abyss of war?

"It is because you have not been faithful to your oaths to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

Senators and Representatives, that is a hard saying, but it is absolutely true.

"The whole world knows that our dispute with the German Government is over two radically different interpretations of international law.

"The Government of Germany contends that a ship carrying cannon and gunners is an armed ship, and that it can be lawfully sunk without warning.

"Our Department of State contends that a ship carrying cannon and gunners declared to be for use in defense is not an armed ship and that to sink it without warning is an offense against the law of nations.

"We all know that submarine warfare is a new thing, concerning which there have been no antecedent agreements or definition of international law.

"Therefore, when this war began to develop the use of sub-marines to destroy enemy commerce, it was necessary that our Government define what uses of the submarine would constitute an offense against the law of nations and what uses would not be offenses against the law of nations, in the opinion of the United States.

"If the Government of the United States defined the sinking without warning and visit of a ship carrying defensive armament to be an offense against the law of nations, then each case of that kind would become a cause of war.

"If the Government of the United States defined a ship carrying cannon and gunners for defense or offense to be an armed ship, then no case in which such a ship was sunk by a submarine without warning would be a cause of war.

That clearly and accurately states the situation, does it not? "Mr. Secretary Lansing first notified all the belligerents that our Government was inclined to hold that a ship carrying armament was armed, and could be lawfully treated as an armed ship by a submarine.

"He subsequently revoked this decision and notified the belligerents that our Government would hold a ship carrying armament for defense only to be an unarmed ship and would consider her treatment as an armed ship by a submarine to be an offense against the law of nations, and that the incidental killing of any American by such an unlawful sinking would be an act of piracy and felony on the high seas which would cause our Government to break off diplomatic relations and seek further redress in its own way.

"This also is a clear and accurate statement of that situation, is it not?

"You agree that it is, do you not?

"Well, then, Senators and Representatives, we impeach you before the high court of your own consciences and charge you before the higher and far more august court of the people of these United States with having openly disobeyed the Constitution of the United States, which you, every one, swore to obey and to uphold when you took your seats in the council chambers of the Nation.

"And we charge and affirm that you have been derelict in your duty, imposed upon you by the Constitution, and that you have, unfaithfully to your sworn obligation, permitted and indorsed the unlawful exercise by a department officer of the sole powers granted to you by the Constitution, and to you alone. "And we charge and affirm that our country is on the edge of war over a definition of felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations unconstitutionally and unlawfully made by the usurpation of your sole powers by a Cabinet officer, with your illegal and unconstitutional assent.

"For, Senators and Representatives, if our fathers wrote any one grant or prohibition of powers clearly into our Supreme Law, they clearly commanded that you, and you alone, should have the power or exercise the power to define what acts of a submarine are and what are not felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations.

"Article I, section 8, paragraph 10, of the Constitution says:

"The Congress shall have power:
"To define and punish piracles and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations.

" And paragraph 11, continuing, says:

"To deciare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water."

"Now, it is impossible to make language more explicit than that.

"Who is commanded by our supreme law to define how a submarine may attack a ship and how it may not, and whether a ship carrying cannon is an armed ship or not an armed ship, and how it may and may not be sunk without committing a felony on the high seas or an offense against the law of nations?

"The Congress-you, you Senators and Representatives. And who has performed this sovereign function of Government, solely confided by the Constitution to your hands?

"Why, Mr. Secretary Lansing has performed that sovereign function.

"And where did he get his authorization to perform a sole function of the Congress?

From you?

" No.

"You could not lawfully delegate that power to him if you tried to. The Constitution affords you no method of stripping yourselves of the sole authority it imposes in you and means you shall solely exercise.

"Neither could you lawfully delegate that power to the President nor to the Supreme Court.

"Mr. Lansing's notification to belligerents that our Government defined and would hold an armed merchant ship to be an armed ship under certain conditions and an unarmed ship under other conditions, and would hold certain submarine acts to be legal and others to be offenses against the law of nations, was a high-handed and impeachable usurpation of the power conferred solely upon yourselves, sitting as the Congress of the United States.

"And when you consent to such a usurpation of your powers you are faithless to your oaths to uphold and maintain and obey the Constitution.

"Consider, now, what has been the result of this dereliction of duty on your part, of this unconstitutional transfer of your authority and powers to a mere department head—a sort of hybrid office created by the Congress, with ill-defined powers and, unfortunately, with a strong tendency among those who occupy it to usurp functions of legislation as well as of adminis-

"Without any mandate from you, without even asking your permission, Mr. Lansing has assumed 'to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations,' with the result that we are face to face with war over Mr. Lansing's definitions.

"You, you who are the sole repositories of the powers to define offenses committed on the seas, as well as the only branch of our Government which can lawfully 'regulate captures on land and sea,' and make war—you have sat in your Chambers unconsulted, unheeded, and with as little weight in the serious discussions and decisions which have been influenced to the constant of the serious discussions and decisions which have been influenced to the constant of the constant discussions and decisions which have been influencing the Na-

"You know your people are opposed to Mr. Lansing's persistent policy of leading the country up to war as one of the allies—because that is exactly what Mr. Lansing has hoped to do and has striven to do ever since he was made Secretary of State.

"And yet you do not enforce your people's will.
"You have not even asserted your own rights or protected the dignity of the Congress.

"Now, then, Senators and Representatives, you are that very body of men whom our fathers made a coequal branch of our tripartite constitutional Government and endowed with certain enumerated powers, which you are sworn to obey and to maintain and to hand down to your successors unimpaired.

"And each time you permit either of the other two branches of the Government to usurp your authority and to exercise powers which the Constitution expressly commands you, and you alone, to exercise you betray your trust, imperil our institu-tions, and threaten the liberties of your children who are to be. "The Nation has been dragged slowly toward entanglement in this insane European war solely because you have not insisted, and do not even now insist, upon exercising your rightful and sole authority and powers that you are sworn to exercise and commanded to exercise by the supreme, fundamental law of the land—the great charter of free government which our fathers drew up for the protection of the land and its liberties through the ages.

"At this tremendous hour, Senators and Representatives, we appeal to you in the name of the whole American people to resume, manfully and resolutely, your rightful place in the Government.

"The President has come to the end of his constitutional authority with the dismissal of the German ambassador.

"That far he had a perfect right to go, and that is as far as .

he has any right at all to go.

"From that moment the Constitution clothed you, Senators and Representatives, with the sole power to decide what next shall be done-you, not Mr. Lansing nor even Mr. Wilson, but you, the Congress.
"Now, you should do your duty to your people, like men who know neither fear of enemies abroad nor of demagogues at home.

"And your very first anxiety, and, indeed, your very first effort should be to ascertain the will of the American people.

"The man who tells you that the opinion of the country is united is either a knave or a fool, and you know it.

"There is a wide division of public opinion.

"There are Americans who do not believe that it is either necessary or sensible to involve the country in war with Ger-

"There are Americans who think it is necessary and sensible to go to war with Germany.
"There are Americans who think we have far more just causes of war with England than with Germany.

"There are Americans who think we have no cause of war with England at all. "There are Americans who think that other Americans who voluntarily embark on belligerent ships and voyage into danger zones have no claim at all to be protected in their foolhardiness.

"There are Americans who would have the country go to war over any American killed, even when on board a belligerent ship armed and carrying tons of ammunition for enemy use.

"There are Americans who think that an armed ship is an armed ship.

"There are Americans who profess to think that an armed ship is not an armed ship.

"Now, upon these questions hangs the issue of peace or war. and since the common people must be the ones to pay for the war, to fight the war, and to endure all the agonies of the war, if war happens, we insist that the common people have a right to be consulted by you, who are their only representatives and their only voice, before they are plunged into war by any vote of yours.
"Therefore we most earnestly urge that you Senators and Representatives order a referendum of these questions to the people themselves, and that the majority of the votes cast in that election be considered binding upon you when you act in your official capacity upon the questions so submitted to the people's decision.

"That you have the power to go to the country for an expression of the people's will is beyond question.

"The Constitution, both by implication and by direction, gives you the power to order and to regulate elections of all kinds.

"The Constitution also expressly recognizes the people as the fountain of all power, including the power of deciding to make war or peace.

"The tenth amendment reads:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

"The tenth amendment was ratified in 1791, so that it is practically an integral part of the original Constitution.

"The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution are rightly construed to recognize the inherent, inalienable right of the American people to instruct their Government to do the will of the people; and, even in emergencies grave enough to justify such an extreme measure, to unite in convention or by referendum to change the forms and the personnel of their Government-a sovereign right which will never be exercised as long as their representatives truly represent them and maintain the time-tried Constitution in its original force.

"It has been urged that the Constitution prescribes no form of holding a referendum election, but that is an ignorant objec-

"The constitutional grant of power to the Congress to do any act presupposes the power of Congress to prescribe the method of performing the act, and the recognition of the reserved sovereignty of the people presupposes the right to prescribe a method of ascertaining the sovereign will.

"You have, Senators and Representatives, the undoubted power to take the suffrages of the American people as a guide to your representative action in this troubled and trying time and we think that you should do that very thing, both to find sure guidance in your own perplexities and to exhibit to a world being slaughtered and wasted by governmental folly and wickedness a noble example of what free government and representative rule can do for a free people.

"If the people by their ballots decide that armed ships can claim protection as peaceful merchantmen; if they decide that Americans who go abroad and into danger zones must be protected even at the cost of war; if they decide that this Nation should interfere in foreign wars and prescribe the methods by which belligerents may carry on war; if they decide that on these accounts we should declare war upon either belligerent group-why, then, the voice of the majority settles those matters, and we will all make ready for war and go to war, united and willing to fight our best.

"And, on the other hand, if the majority of the people say nay to these propositions, then we should not declare war and should not insist upon the 'rules for captures' and the definitions of 'felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations' which Mr. Lansing has formulated without any authority whatsoever and in direct derogation and impeachable usurpation of the sole functions of the Congress of the United

"If the people of the United States do not agree with Mr. Lansing and by their votes say that they are averse to his unauthorized rules and definitions, and that they are opposed to a declaration of war against Germany on that score—why, then, the voice of the majority should settle those matters in that way, and you should refrain from hostile declarations, and we should all keep the peace together as willingly as we should all fight together if the people's verdict was for war.

"Senators and Representatives, is not this good sense, true patriotism, and a right exercise of your representative functions which we now urge upon your consideration?

"You come from the people. "You are part of the people.

"You are the representatives of the people and the servants

"Have you any moral right to plunge your people into this dreadful and murderous war without making sure that such is the will of the majority of your people?

'Senators and Representatives, there can be no possible need of haste in declaring war upon any country, especially upon Germany.

"We would, indeed, go into the war just that much better prepared if we used several weeks in discussion and in taking prepared if we used several weeks in discussion and in taking a vote of the people.

"We can see no possible objection to your taking the vote of the American people upon these propositions.

"And we can see, and we think we have presented to you, weighty and powerful reasons why you should take the vote of your countrymen before you put the Nation in a state of war.

"Senators and Representatives, there lies before you the noblest opportunity to show the world the force and authority and beneficence of free government that ever came to any legislative body in all the tide of time.

"You can if you will write the most momentous and the most

"You can, if you will, write the most momentous and the most splendid chapter of human history that has ever been written since history began.

"For yourselves you can reassume and emphasize the right-ful powers and dignity of your great assembly which have been, most unfortunately, trenched upon and abated by a succession of presidential encroachments, extending over a period of at least 30 years, and which ought to be, and which must be, resisted and nullified if free, representative Government under our great charter is to maintain its vigor.

"For your people you can emphasize their inherent liberty to govern themselves and their immemorial and undoubted right to express their will and to have their will respected and obeyed by their public servants and chosen representatives.

"For mankind, you can do an immense service by holding up to their gaze the fruitful and beneficent results of free govern-ment, which is, indeed, our high and rightful mission in the

"And upon such a great deed, so nobly and so usefully performed, you can indeed with confidence invoke the same considerate judgment of mankind and the same approval of Divine Providence which our wise and valiant fathers invoked upon the declaration of our liberties and the firm establishment of that Constitution which still remains the supreme law of the Republic, and the most glorious affirmation and protection of orderly freedom that was ever devised by the wit of any of the children of men.

"May that God who guided our fathers and our folk through all the perils and vicissitudes of our past, guide you, too, Senators and Representatives, in this hour of perplexity and danger to find the way in which your people can walk in honor and in

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I also insert an address by the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, who has embodied in him that spirit proclaimed by the Founder of Christianity when he said that "He came that the children of earth might have a more abundant

THE UNITED STATES ON TRIAL.

[Address of Jenkin Lloyd Jones at Abraham Lincoln Center, Chicago, on Sunday, Feb. 4.]

"Something has happened this week, something ominous, something tragic. Something that may carry with it floods of tears, oceans of blood, and destroy towers of treasure. I must declare myself in this presence, were it the last word ever given me to speak from this free platform: If war was wrong last week, it will be wrong next week. If it was wrong then to tear human fiesh to shreds, to devastate homes and descrate the ideals of men and of nations, it is wrong now, and it is everlastingly wrong.

"War is still a survival of brute forces. It occurs where spirit has not yet freed itself from the entanglements of things that can be measured, of things that can be weighed. We of the United States for two and a half years have been twiddling our thumbs while Europe was tearing itself to pieces. We have gloated over our increasing prosperity, the profits from our hellish industry of making things that kill. We have sowed the Continent of Europe thick with fragments of shell and bullets stained with human blood. We have filled hospitals with agonized bodies. We have torn homes to pieces. We have planted uncounted acres with human bones. We—I say we—have been sending this devilish stuff over there to do the work of hell, while taking shelter behind some thin, shadowy rag of what we call "international law." Alas, now we are in grave danger of being swept into this fiendish madness which we have witnessed and fostered.

"Do not tell me that there is any 'honor' in trying to avenge the loss of a few petty ships and a limited number of lives by proceeding by conquest and under the guidance of science to sink numberless other ships and destroy numberless other lives on both sides of the fighting line, killing those whose hands are clean of any responsibility. As I interpret spirit, no wrong can be atoned by other wrongs. You can not bring back the lives that are gone by sallying forth to destroy other "Three great inspirations of war have obtained in what we call civilization. First was the battle for God. Some of the hardest battles of history were devoted to religion; they were for God's sake.

"Then there was the battle for greed, for territory, the love of power. Many millions of lives have been sacrificed in trying to straighten boundary lines between nations which scarcely knew themselves apart.

"Then there comes this other thing we call 'honor'—battle for honor's sake. As if any nation in the light of history could add a star to its crown of glory by proving itself of superior power in killing its neighbors. As if outraged dignity could be assuaged by a systematic slaughter of innocents.

"The United States is now under a panic for 'honor's sake.'
This valor for 'honor' threatens to throw us into everlasting dishonor. I have lived through three of these spasms. I remember the dark midnight when, as a boy, I crawled out of bed with the rest of the family because the bigger brother had come home with the awful news that Sumter had been fired upon. I have often traced with you that inspiration, that intoxication, to the bitter end, and found, as everybody now knows, that it was the very, very wrong way of doing the right

"I remember, as most of you remember, that other time when the flags climbed to the highest and fireworks illuminated the cities, that otherwise were torpid and stupid, with the cry, 'Remember the Maine! Remember the Maine! Remember the Maine! Remember the Maine!' And, remembering the Maine, the great Republic was precipitated into a mad, foolish, fruitless war. Our minister to Spain told me with his own lips, and he has repeated it over and over again in public, that if the United States had but let reason rule 48 or 72 hours longer everything would have been accomplished by diplomacy at the capital city of Spain that we repeated in catting by hypital marginess bloody by hyperisms in succeeded in getting by brutal, merciless, bloody barbarism, including a compensation for the Maine, for which Spain never admitted her guilt. It was a mad intensity that led us into that fruitless struggle.

"And now comes this excitement. When pugilists, in the last desperate struggle for conquest, resort to the ultimate expediencies of fighters, no longer content to pull at each other's hair or clutch at each other's throats, they forget all the limitations that obtain in the ring and hit anywhere, above or below the belt. We, who sit by, witnessing all these things, seeing this desperate struggle, because our own supposed 'rights' are now invaded a little bit and our commerce is endangered, become enraged. Will we dare jump into this ring at this time to add wickedness to wickedness and murder to murder?

"May God help us to reenforce the spirit, that we may carry this diplomatic perplexity to the court of reason, to listen to the impulses of love, and to take a 'quarter of an hour,' nationally speaking, to commune with God and with the voice within. We should go behind that ragged page, born out of expediency and cruelty, the selfishness of formality and precedent, which we call 'international law,' a thing of shreds and tatters at best, born out of a false assumption that the normal relations between nations are those of rivalry and antagonism and not of a community interest.

"Steps may be taken down there at Washington this week which will strike a bloody sword deep into the flesh of this Nation, where a million quivering nerves, deeper than consciousness, bind us to the fatherland over there. It is international vivisection, without cause and without profit, if we look at it even on the external side of things alone. Here our new Germany is summoned to our colors to strike at the heart of the fatherland.

"I have mounted guard on many a weary watch under the direction of a German sergeant. I have divided my rations with and profited by the prowess of 'Fred Schmidt' more than once. I walked afoot while my German lieutenant rode horse-I saw Carl Schurz, clad in the panoply of war, lead his Eleventh and Twelfth Corps up the bloody side of Missionary Ridge. I saw dear old Col. Matthias, of the 'Fife-th' Iowa, as he used to call it, after the bloody battle of Corinth, dismounting and falling on the logs as he sobbed, 'My boys! My poor boys!—100 or more of them lying there in one trench. I know of Col. Matthias on the charge. I know of how the boys loved him on the march. He had a reputation for discipline and military usefulness which he brought from his years of training across the sea, but I think of Col. Matthias most tenderly shedding bitter tears over that open grave where his boys were lying—those boys who were so much alive the day before.
"All the United States is quivering with gentle emotions today where divided loyalties are being challenged by the cruel brutality that may declare war with a precipitancy with which no benignant project, national or otherwise, would be entered upon.

"So I stand here to say again that war is wrong, unalterably wrong, an inheritance from the brute, and there is a better way to do it.

"Said a man to me the other day when I was talking to the students of the Lane Technical High School, 'Do you think that your ideals will come true in a thousand years?' I did not wait for the conclusion of his sentence before I exclaimed, 'That is none of my business. I don't know whether it will be a thousand years or five thousand years. I know where I belong, and I know what ultimately will triumph.'

"The time is coming for the United States to decide whether it will ally itself with Christ or with Cæsar; whether the law of love can be tried or the law of hate be resorted to.

"Oh, but 'honor! honor!' Honor to the wind where love and right and beauty and humanity are jeopardized. Oh, our country will be valorous on sea or land, if it sallies forth, but it will be a valor allied to cowardice compared to the sublime valor of Calvary, which still waits for a nation to vindicate the Christ as he has been overwhelmingly vindicated in individual lives.
"And so to ease my own soul—not because I thought it could reach the center-I send this telegram to our President, in whom

I have trusted and in whom I still have hope:

"Keep us out of war. The incivilities of war-maddened monarchies are no adequate excuse for plunging a great democracy into the same madness. The destruction of a few lives and ships can not be atoned for by sacrificing countless lives and homes. A wrong can not be righted by added wrongs. Our crowning dishonor would be to surrender to the war spirit in this dire crisis of civilization and of our boasted Christianity. Now, if ever, should the choice be made: Is it Christ or Cassar?

"While the blackest, the damnedest war is a transient thing and the triumphs of the noblest and greatest of wars are evanescent, still the tides of life are ever onward and upward, and we,

God helping us, must go in that direction."

The Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones in this address speaks the sentiment of the great masses of the patriotic Americans upon whose loyalty this country must rely if it is involved in war, and who should be consulted before war is declared, so that they may have an opportunity to choose whether they will shoot down their fellow men and be shot down on account of the heads of this Federal administration assuming the responsibility of defining and enforcing an international law upon which there is a great difference of opinion among our greatest international lawyers. I insist that becoming involved in this awful catastrophe and carnage without anything definite to be accom-plished should be submitted to a vote of the rank and file of the American citizens, to whose loyalty and patriotism are due the great achievements of this Republic, whose lives must be sacrificed in case of war, and whose backs will be bent low with the burden of indebtedness which will be created by such a war.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Dent].

Mr. MONDELL, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama withhold for five minutes to give me an opportunity to address the House?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for five minutes to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in the time granted me I decimally adopted by the House two memorials adopted by the sire to present to the House two memorials adopted by the Fourteenth Legislature of the State of Wyoming relative to legislation pending before Congress. In the early part of this Congress the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] introduced a bill providing for the establishment of game refuges in forest reservations, one of the provisions of the bill being that those reservations, one of the provisions of the bill being that those refuges could be established upon approval of the governor of the State. A hearing was had on the bill, at which I appeared and protested against the provisions of the bill. Later another bill was introduced by the same gentleman, H. R. 17381, similar to the first bill, but providing that game refuges could only be established on the approval of the State legislature by joint resolution. Those bills were considered by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, and the legislature, in house joint memorial No. 1, records its objection to the passage of either of those bills on the ground that their enactment would seriously conflict with the authority of the State in the care, regulation, and preservation of game, and the legislature asks the Congress to refrain from enacting legislation in any way affecting the wild game within the borders of the State. The memorial in full is as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That—Whereas there is before the Congress of the United States a bill for an act to establish game sanctuaries in the national forests, under rules and regulations to be put in force and places to be designated by the President upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture; and Whereas such a bill if enacted into law would seriously conflict with the authority of the State of Wyoming in the care, regulation, and preservation of the game within the borders of said State; and Whereas the State Legislature of Wyoming has for years been particularly careful in providing for the perservation of such wild game by legislation regulating the place, number, and manner in which such game may be killed by sportsmen, so that the said game has increased very materially and its elk herds are now larger than at any time since the preservation of wild game was initiated; and Whereas the contemplated legislation by Congress threatens to interfere with the wise regulations now in force for the grazing of domestic stock upon the forest reserves: Therefore

We, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming,

we, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming, hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to refrain from enacting legislation in any way affecting the wild game within the borders of our State; and be it

*Resolved*, That engrossed copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Wyoming, viz, Hon. CLARENCE D. CLARE, FRANCIS E. WARREN, and FRANK W. MONDELL, asking their aid in bringing the object of this memorial before Congress; and be it further *Resolved*, That copies of this memorial be sent to each of the governors of the States having national forest reserves within their boundaries, asking their cooperation with the object of this memorial.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] introduced in the early part of this Congress a bill (H. R. 406) to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium. The bill was before the House several days, during which time I called attention to what I considered its objectionable features, and offered a number of amendments, some of which were adopted. The bill is now before the Senate. I desire to present to the Congress enrolled joint memorial No. 1, Senate, Fourteenth Legislature of the State of Wyoming, pro-testing against the legislation in its present form, and I ask that the memorial be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the memorial will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enrolled joint memorial 1.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the House of Representatives concurring) that—

Whereas hundreds of citizens of this State have taken oil placer claims under the oil placer mining act, and have compiled with the law in good faith by doing the assessment work required to hold and develop said claims; and

Whereas in many cases these lands have been located and held by prospectors who have expended their time and money for many years in trying to hold and develop these oil placer claims until the conditions and demand for the product would make it possible to operate the same; and the same; and

Whereas these lands were located and held under the only law that made it possible for the prospector for oil or gas to acquire the same;

Whereas these lands were located and held under the only law that made it possible for the prospector for oil or gas to acquire the same; and Whereas these locations were made in good faith and held by the locators before any withdrawal of said lands was made or even contemplated by the Government; and Whereas there is now before Congress a bill known as the Ferris-Phelan bill, providing for the leasing of all oil and gas lands on the public domain; and Whereas this bill in its present form would destroy and take from the original locators their vested rights or compel them to defend the same in the courts, causing endless litigation with wealthy oil operators who might seek to deprive them of their legitimate rights; and Whereas it appears the said leasing bill, as now drawn, is in the interest of the large foreign oil companies and against the interests of the original locators and settlers, and is flagrantly unfair and unjust to all original claimants, in that it ignores their rights and permits the land to be leased to any applicant without considering the interests of the original locators: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to amend said leasing bill to give to all locators who have held the land in good faith and have compiled with the oil placer mining law the preferential right to lease the same on the same terms that may be required from any other applicant; and be it further

Resolved, That the bill as now drawn is unjust and unfair, and will, if passed, result in placing all the oil lands of this State in the hands of the large oil companies and operators, and jeopardize the rights of the original locators in claims that have in many cases been held and worked by them for years; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the Hon. Frank W. Mondell, asking their aid in carrying out the object of this resolution.

President of the Senate.

J. W. Todd, President of the Senate. C. X. Jones, Speaker of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, our people feel that this bill in its present form does a great injustice to honest, industrious people who, in accordance with law, proceeded to start upon the development of the public lands. I have heretofore protested against the unfair and indefensible provisions of the act in question and I have the protect of any large land. tion, and I hope the protest of our legislators will be given full and favorable consideration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20783, the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20783, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. Saunders in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] desires to use some time now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I was first elected to Congress in 1896. I came into the Fifty-fifth Congress at the special session which President McKinley called as a new Member of the House. There were then some difficulties in Cuba in which the people of the United States were taking a great interest. There was considerable agitation in the United States to have this country in some way intervene or interfere, or whatever it might be, to give Cuba its freedom.

Following the extra session of Congress in 1897, at which session there was more or less agitation on the subject, came the long session, which commenced in December, 1897, and there was, I think, as much excitement in the House in reference to the Cuban situation as I have ever seen in the House during my service on any great public question. When we first talked of war with Spain I laughed at the idea that there was any occasion for this country to get into a war with Spain. After the Maine was blown up the feeling in the country apparently became very strongly accentuated, and in course of time we reached the point where we passed a resolution in reference to Cuba, declaring that Cuba was of right free, and so forth, which later led to a declaration of war.

I venture to say that when these things were going on, when war was declared, there was not a single Member of the House who had any thought of the Philippine Islands. Oh, academically speaking, they may have known where the Philippine Islands were. Of course up in the Navy Department they were figuring upon what the Navy could do at any place in the world against Spain if we should have war, but no one here, I think, I dreamed that the war with Spain would have any effect except merely to break Cuba free from Spain, and that that would be the end of it. I think the House at that time was quite determined that the United States should not take and retain possession of Cuba.

Well, I am not going to undertake to discuss what the effect of the War with Spain has been. Almost at the first jump out of the box we were in possession of Manila, and then of the Philippine Islands, and we were told, and have been told many times since, that our whole relationship to the world was modifled and materially changed, partly by our taking the Philippine Islands, but certainly as the result of the Spanish War. And I venture to say now that no nation which goes to war can possibly predict to itself what the eventual results will be, whether it is victor or vanquished in the war; that no one can figure out the possibilities, though we may figure out what may possibly happen. But we can not figure the limit.

I do not wish to detain the House very long. On August 18, 1914, just a few days after the war broke out, I made a very short and brief statement to the House, which I am going to read again. I think it was a pat statement then. I am not so sure that it is fully applicable row, though I believe it is worth thinking about. I said:

It seems to me that in this country at this time it is extremely important that everyone in official life, as well as those in private life, should resolve firmly that they will not be carried away with any hysterical emotion or by any partisan feeling for or against either side in this conflict abroad. [Applause.]

I believe that this is an opportunity for America which seldom or never has come before to any nation in the world. The great powers abroad are in deadly conflict. I had hoped and believed even after the war commenced that it would not really commence; but it looks now as though there would be a desperate struggle for existence by these nations engaged in war. There will be many times when complications will arise affecting our interests and our policies.

When men are engaged in a life struggle they are not careful or too particular about the interests of outsiders or about observing the ordinary courtesies or amenities laid down in advance for the control of conflicts. When these occasions arise where we are tempted to become partisan for or against, where we are tempted in order to preserve what we may call our honor to engage in the conflict, let us make up our minds now to keep our minds firm in that determination that this country shall not become under any circumstances engaged in the war on either side.

[Applause.]

[Applause.]

I believe the administration under President Wilson will be cool and calm. The danger will come when some American ship may be seized or some American interest may be affected, when people will become excited. It is the duty of all parties in this House and elsewhere, the duty of all good citizens, to stand behind the administration and make the administration feel that its duty to humanity, to civilization, and to the interests of the United States and her citizens is to keep out of the struggle.

[Applause.]

Now, we may be drawn into the struggle. If we are, whatever opinion we may have had in reference to the propriety of being drawn into the struggle will be merged in a universal opinion to stand for the country in what it determines to do. [Applause.] I want to call attention to this: Suppose we become engaged in the European war, and finally there are overtures for peace from one side or the other. If we are a party to the war, we have got to sit in at the final councils. We will have to help to determine the terms of peace, and at once, at one sweep, we will have abandoned the traditional and long-continued policy of the United States to remain supreme on the American Continent and to keep out of the complications of the European Continent. [Applause.] And when we engage in endeavoring to determine the boundary lines of the various nations of Europe, the terms upon which peace shall be made, the guaranties which will be exacted in reference to the small powers of Europe, we will have placed ourselves in a position where it becomes our duty to endeavor to regulate what Bulgaria or Greece or Servia or Holland or Belgium or Russia or the great or small powers, wherever they may be, shall do. And when we undertake to enter a policy which requires us to interfere in European affairs we can no longer ask or insist upon the traditional policy of the United States that European countries shall keep their hands out of American affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. MANN. Yes.
Mr. DIES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if some nation in Europe involved in this war should bid our peaceful commerce off the sea and declare that we should no longer conduct our commerce in obedience to the laws of nations, does he think we should refuse, in obedience to that request or warning, to declare our rights to commerce?

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman think?

Mr. DIES. If I make a speech and undertake to tell the American people what to do, I will tell them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is asking me a question in order to embarrass me. It is a question he can not answer now, and when he answers it I will answer it. [Applause.] I do not know what position I will take or what position Congress will be a support of the control of the con take when specific cases may arise; but I will say this for myself: I am determined to do everything within my power to keep our country out of the present European war. [Applause.]
Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Mr. MANN. I do not yield to the gentleman from Texas. If it becomes necessary for the United States at any time to lick any foreign country, I am willing to join and help do it. [Applause.] I think we ought to keep out of this war if we can, and I am trusting, with hope and faith, that the President of the United States will do everything that he thinks can possibly be done to keep us out of the war. [Applause.]

But I simply rose in the main to excite a little more the attention of the House toward the facts if we get into war. God only knows where it will land this country. I believe that so far as we can it is to our interest to remain the dominant force in the civilization of the American Continent and not to atthe civilization of the American Continent and not to attempt to think that we have the duty of regulating the Old World and its conduct. [Applause.] We do pretty well when we take care of ourselves well. We have a greater burden, which we have not yet very successfully carried, to help protect and take care of the Republics of Central and South America. When we have performed that job to the credit of ourselves and to the interest of those Republics and civilization I think it will be time interest of those Republics and civilization I think it will be time enough then for us to undertake to regulate the conduct and civilization of the older nations in Europe now engaged in an effort to destroy civilization. I regret it, but I hope we can keep out of it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 14 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Chago].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I shall support the bill which is pending before the committee. I regard it not as a war measure but as a great peace measure. I think I am perfectly frank when I say that every member of the Committee on Military Affairs in working on this bill felt that he was working for something which would help keep these United States supreme on this continent, and that instead of appropriating for anything which could cause us any embarrassment with other nations, or draw us into complications with other nations, we were legislating for something which would in a measure, at least, prevent our being drawn into this great conflict which now wages in Europe.

My only regret is that we have not heretofore made such appropriations in our Army bill; that we had not long ago taken mp a more definite military policy. Like several of the members of the minority on that committee, I have reserved the right to vote for an increase of appropriations on certain portions of We do this without criticizing the motives of the majority in their conclusions as to the proper amounts to ap-I recognize that these men have worked out these appropriations as they have viewed the situation for the coming year. Some of us want increases here and there, but in a measure I think the bill should meet the expectations of those who want a real military force in this country.

Mr. Chairman, speaking personally just for a moment, about one year ago I severed my connection with the organization of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, with which I had been connected for a period of more than 25 years. I did that with a twofold purpose. First, as the Committee on Military Affairs approached the question of legislating for a federalized National Guard, for pay for the members of the National Guard and the officers of the National Guard, I felt that as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and as a Member of this House I had no business legislating for something in which I was personally interested. In the second place, I wanted to know and feel just how it was to look at the question of the federalized National Guard from an impersonal standpoint, with what little knowledge I had gained in military science through my short experience. I wanted to know if my opinions on this subject were unduly colored by my association with military organizawere unduly colored by my association with minitary organiza-tions; and since that time I believe I have been listening with-out any prejudice whatever to any argument, and reading on the subject wherever I could find intelligent information, trying to form in my own mind some idea of a proper military policy which would appeal to the people of this country and at the same time give us an effective force with which to maintain our Nation and our institutions.

Now, in this bill we have appropriated for the National Guard as it was federalized by the act of June 3, 1916, and I want to say here that you will find in these hearings that the National Guard which was called into the service of the United States on June 18, 1916, was not the National Guard which was contemplated or was expected to exist under the provisions of the act of June 3, 1916. In other words, the act of June 3 had not gone into effect, so far as the National Guard was concerned. Hence all these criticisms of the National Guard in that call for the border service are based on a wrong conception of what we had to call on when that call of June 18 was made.

Now, although I wish to reply to these criticisms, I also wish to try to distinguish between those criticisms which reflect upon the National Guard as a system and those which criticize the men and the officers and the organization of that federalized National Guard; and in doing this I want to be very slow to criticize what we designate as our Regular Army and the offi-cers of our Regular Army. I want to distinguish between the splendid service which they have rendered as citizens and as officers and the criticisms we may offer to particular branches of the service. I do not want to be understood as condemning our Army or our Army officers. I do believe, however, that this report which was put out by the Division of Militia Affairs, entitled "A report on the mobilization of the Organized Militia and National Guard," is not truly labeled, is not a proper report, and that from it false conclusions have been drawn.

Now, in the first place, this report makes no mention of any particular organization. They gathered facts and figures at random, and if those facts and figures were gathered under the same confusing conditions that existed when these men were being mustered into the service of the United States they are not worth the paper they are written on, because from my own personal knowledge I know that the officers of the Army—the departmental officers—were all at sea as to their respective duties and as to what was actually expected of them. The desks of all the adjutants general of the States were piled up with contradictory orders from Washington and from the different departments. This was not the fault of the National Guard or the fault of the National Guard or the fault of the National Guard or the fault of the National Guard will be a sea as to their respective duties and the sea as to their respective duties and their respective duties are respective duties. directly to the lack of a well-defined military system here at

Now, as to the first of these criticisms, the newspapers of the country naturally took from this report the conclusions which the Army officers did not make, but which their figures were intended to justify. One of these was the statement taken from the figures to be found in the hearings and the testimony of Maj. Gen. Scott, the Chief of Staff, on page 759 of the hear-

These figures would indicate that 60 per cent of those men who answered the call had no previous military training.

Eminent men and newspapers in this country have scattered this statement abroad as a condemnation of the National Guard. A former Secretary of War pointed this out as one of the damning features of the National Guard a few days ago here in Washington, when, as a matter of fact, the company organiza-tions on the 18th day of June, when the National Guard was called into the service of the United States, were supposed to consist of 65 men to a company, being the peace strength.

The company commanders were directed to recruit these companies up to a war strength of 150 men; and then, strange as it may seem, after they had increased their strength from outside their ranks almost 140 per cent, it was said to be a condemnation of the system under which they work if even 60 per cent of the men who answered the call to arms were found not to have had previous military training. Such arguments as these are childish. They only show the animus back of such an argument.

Another thing was in the matter of the qualifications as to marksmanship.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question right along that line?

Mr. ORAGO. Yes.
Mr. HARDY. The gentleman says they were ordered to recruit their companies up to 150 men each.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. Mr. HARDY. If t

Mr. HARDY. If they did that, and then only 60 per cent were found to have had previous military training, the gentleman's argument would be accurate.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.
Mr. HARDY. I sympathize with the gentleman in his position, but what I want to know as a matter of fact is to what extent did they recruit the companies?

Mr. CRAGO. From my knowledge of the facts it ran from 85 men, which was a very low mark for any company, and that was often in the cases of companies where they had only 45 or 50 men when the recruiting was begun, up to 150 men, the maximum, and some companies recruited beyond that and turned their recruits over to other companies. I should say a fair average probably would be from 100 to 125 men, more than enough to account for the percentage which they gave.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not also true that at the same time the Regular Army units were on the border with great numbers of recruits themselves, men who had seen no previous military experience and had no military training?

Mr. CRAGO. That is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And they came in under the resolution providing for an increase of 20,000 men in the Regular Army and subsequently under the first increment under the national-defense act?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And is it not also true that many of the companies of the Regular Army were below their war strength? Mr. CRAGO. Absolutely; and they could not get recruits. The National Guard did get recruits over night. They furnished this Government with almost 140,000 enlisted men, with trained officers to handle them. When the Government could not turn in any other direction, and was absolutely helpless for recruits for the Regular Army, the National Guard furnished the men who were needed. We are told that some of the Regu-lar Army organizations which went to the border and some which went to Vera Cruz had as low as 20 men to the company. I know this is true, that so many officers had been detailed on special duty here in Washington and elsewhere that company after company of the regular units were commanded by second lieutenants, lieutenants of the National Guard, and in some cases noncommissioned officers, not a single commissioned officer being present with his company, because these officers were doing work which could have been done by some clerk at a very small salary. In fact, much clerical work has been done by men holding the rank of captains and majors which should have been done by clerks. I can give you one illustration. They had a garage located near the Pennsylvania division, under the control of the Army, and they had a captain and a first lieutenant to run that garage. You know that no business concern and no business man would advocate a proposition of that kind. A sergeant or a private who was acquainted with that business could have conducted the affairs of that office as well as those men did, and perhaps better. Yet here were men of that high rank taken away from the real service of the Army to do this clerical work which could have been done as well by less expensive and less needed men.

But I was about to speak of the marksmanship of the National Guard, which was complained of. After this increase in the number of the guard by recruiting it was discovered that only 37 per cent of them had been qualified as marksmen. Now, for years the organization with which I have been associated made this ironclad rule that a man could not retain his place in that organization if he did not every year go out on the rifle range and qualify at least as a marksman if not as a sharp-shooter or an expert. That applied to every officer and enlisted

Now, as to the confusion in the muster and many of the things which happened there I do not care to go into detail. I do know this, that much of the confusion was caused by the I do know this, that much of the contusion was caused by the lack of coordination of the different departments of the War Department. Men were working seemingly at cross purposes. One case on the border with which I am familiar was where they were building an unloading depot. The railroad was on a pretty good grade and below that was the ground where the goods would have to be moved from the cars. Some one conceived the notion that if they would build the unloading sta-tion on a level with the car doors, the goods could be shoved right off the cars, and that would place them about the proper height to load them aboard the wagons, when they were to be transported to their destination and distributed among Then it was discovered that there was an ironclad regulation which must be adhered to that every unloading depot must be constructed with its floor on the ground and made of concrete. And what did they do? They made a concrete foundation on the ground where everything had to be unloaded down onto it with a great deal of trouble and expense, and then loaded up onto the wagons again instead of doing the sensible thing, which could have been done had there been more elasticity and more good judgment used in making these regulations. In other cases the supplies were stored in places within half a mile of the border, and a whole division depended for its supply of rations and commissary stores kept in a place which was within sight of the enemy, had there been any enemy.

Now, I think a great mistake has been made in minimizing the experience of these men on the border. The fact that the newspapers of this country have condemned this service has taken a great deal of the pride out of these men who so willingly and so patriotically offered their services when the President thought they were needed. Only the other night, I was glad to hear Maj. Gen. Scott say, the purpose of mobilizing the guard on the border had been accomplished, that prior to that time they were hearing continually of the invasion of our border by the Mexicans, but that since the guard had gone down there he had never heard anything of that kind. The Mexicans thought the only Army we could possibly muster was our small Regular force, and when within a few days' time these volunteer organizations were sent down there it put an entirely different aspect on affairs.

From the report of William A. Mann, brigadier general, General Staff, Chief of Militia Bureau, dated December 19, 1916. I take the following:

Number of members of National Guard transported to the border to date.

Strength of National Guard troops in the service of the United States July 31, 1916, on border.

In State mobilization camps.

This is the condition just 13 days after the call was made. Concerning this mobilization Gen. Mann speaks as follows:

The mobilization of the National Guard and its dispatch to the border was a great accomplishment, involving a multitude of details and the cooperation of numerous officers, agents and officials, who gave to the task their best efforts. Whatever mistakes were made were those of judgment and not of purpose. Undoubtedly the immediate purpose of the call was attained. It may not be too much to say that the knowledge and experience gained from the mobilization are incidental advantages worth the cost.

Mr. CALDWELL. I hope the gentleman will not forget to comment on the charge that the supplies were improperly used. Mr. CRAGO. I think that is treated of in the hearings to such an extent that I need not allude to it. It was only a matter of misadministration.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that his opinion is that the main trouble with the mobilization was inefficiency on the part of the War Department, whose duty it was to conduct the mobilization, rather than upon part of the men who were serving their country?

Mr. CRAGO. Absolutely; and I think the War Department will admit it. In regard to the matter of clothing and food for the National Guard, this was a duty to be performed by the Government. When the men of these organizations had to stand around, in view of the public, with no clothing except their torn and tattered civilians clothes, it was not a criticism of the National Guard, it was a criticism of the War Department, which had the matter in charge. Some of the men of these organizations were not yet properly equipped when they came home after four or five months' service.

Mr. HARDY. If I understand the gentleman right, that was a criticism of the Army itself, who under the War Department,

Mr. CRAGO. I think it would be.
Mr. CRAGO. Yes.
Mr. CRAGO. Yes.
Mr. MANN. Is that wholly a criticism of the Army, or possibly in part a criticism that we ought to take to ourselves, in not having provided the means by which the Army would have these things?

Mr. CRAGO. I will say that I tried to make a suggestion that I was not condemning the individual officers of the Army at this time, and that criticism might apply to former years, but I do not think it did apply to the circumstances as they existed in 1916, because there was no question then about appropriations being available, and in an event of that kind they should have done as they did in many other instances, gone right ahead, secured the supplies, and trusted to a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. MANN. Would it not have been wiser if we had given . the money in advance? I am willing to take my share of the gave the department every dollar it asked for.

Mr. KAHN. When the emergency arose in Mexico Congress

Mr. MANN. When it arose, but not before it arose.

Mr. CRAGO. That was too late to provide and furnish clothing.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a matter of record, before the Mexican situation arose the Quartermaster General came before our committee and testified that they had 350,000 reserve equipments for the Army, and when the trouble came the present officers in command say that they did not have them, but the committee before that was informed that they did

Mr. CRAGO. I believe the gentleman is correct. Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will yield, as I recollect the testimony from year to year, the Quartermaster General stated that they had a reserve supply sufficient to equip half a million men.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; Gen. Aleshire made that statement to the committee.

Mr. CRAGO. Now, there is a provision of law that the extra equipment to provide uniforms, and so forth, for the National Guard shall be at a central point for instant distribution. For Pennsylvania it was at Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more. Mr. CRAGO. The information came to us that instead of the material being available in Pennsylvania, while the boys were at Mount Gretna going around with civilian clothes on, and without any semblance of blankets or uniforms necessary to equip them, it was found that some one had ordered the equipment removed from Philadelphia to the training camp at Platts-We have not yet found out by whose authority they were removed, but I have my own notion about it.

Now, I would like, if I had time, to take up in a brief way some suggestions for further improvements in our military system. am not entirely satisfied that the federalized National Guard is the best solution of our military policy. Do not understand me as saying so. I believe we will have to study the question, but above all, gentlemen, we must have some system of training which will furnish us with men, which will be acceptable to the people. Instead of meeting and resolving and sitting down to people. Instead of meeting and resolving and sitting down to great dinners and discussing the problem, if we will take the trouble to go before the people with some plan which we can back up we can convince the people that some better system is necessary. If we go to the people of this country with a well-digested plan, a democratic plan, by which we may have men and organizations in an emergency, I have faith enough in the people of the country to believe that they will indorse and back it to the limit. [Applause ] To show how have need a men are init to the limit. [Applause.] To show how bus ness men are interested in this subject I wish to insert in the Record as a part of my remarks the resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1917.

Resolutions of Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Resolutions of Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Whereas, by due action of the Congress and the Senate of the United States, there has been provided legislation for the purpose of insuring military and naval defense for the national security and welfare; and Whereas such appropriations have been made from the public moneys as are necessary to the practical consummation of these definite legislative plans for the national defense; and Whereas this chamber views with the greatest interest the results which, under the necessities of the condition of modern war, are being achieved in foreign countries through a shattering of century-old precedents and the creation of new and closer relations of cooperative action between governments, governmental departments, and all lines of private industry and service; and Whereas this chamber can not but give the most serious attention to this trend of events in foreign countries, and view with great concern the commercial as well as the military and naval assets of the future; and

Whereas at the last annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States certain specific recommendations bearing upon this subject were respectfully submitted to the President by this body: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That this chamber tender to the President of the United States and to the legislative bodies its deep appreciation of the progress which has been made during the past year in the consummation of vital plans for the adequate defense of this country against invasion. And be it further

Resolved—
First. That this chamber, realizing the absolute necessity of a greatly increased and more practically effective cooperation between our governmental departments and civilian activities and capacities in every line, respectfully urges the active and continuous prosecution of those plans already authorized by law for the attainment of these objects.

Second. That the chamber urges the importance of the following store:

Second. That the chamber urges the importance of the following steps:

(a) Development of a definite national plan by the Council of National Defense and action in conformity with this plan by the director of the council.

(b) In order to obtain practical results, it is essential that the rank and standing of the director be on an equality with that of the Chief of Staff of the Army and Chief of Operations of the Navy.

(c) Emphasize the desirability of continuity of service of the director and personnel of his staff.

(d) Provisions that the council, in accordance with the responsibilities of the creating act, shall immediately develop the machinery through which to bring to the aid of the Government the organized taient and active and potential energies of the Nation "for the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation."

(e) For the maintenance of the public interest and the insurance of the needed civilian cooperation, giving the widest possible publicity to the work and plans of the council.

Third. That the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reaffirms the principle laid down by referendum No. 15 that the basis of supply of Government requirements in war and peace from private sources shall be at a rate of profit so low as to preclude a profit interest in war. Fourth. That the chamber pledge the unqualified support of the business interests represented within its membership to the Council of National Defense and to the active consummation of its plans.

Fifth, That the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reaffirms its hearty support of the principle of universal military training as laid down in proposal No. 7 of referendum No. 15, and your committee deigns to hope that the Nation generally will be brought to realize that no principle is more in accord with a republican form of government, no doctrine more truly democratic than that which asserts that every able-bodied male citizen owes military service to his country. "The origin of every right is in a duty fulfilled."

I believe all our people will admit there is necessity for some military service. We also admit that our Regular Army can not be maintained at a sufficient strength to carry on even a defensive war. The question then is, Shall we, as a great and powerful Nation, in case of any emergency, send our young men into the service to be slaughtered because of their ignorance of military science, or shall we have our citizens so trained and equipped before trouble does come that they may be able to meet an enemy without a handicap or lack of training, equipment, and experience?

I wish every American citizen would take this subject under consideration without passion and without prejudice. If every citizen would read that splendid book entitled "The American Army," by Maj. Gen. Carter, I believe he would see this question in a new light.

I take the following quotation from this book:

No great nation has ever yet been able to establish and maintain a permanent form of government without an armed power to sustain it. Nations unable or unwilling to defend their rights are accorded scant respect. Helpiess peoples rankling with injustice may hold rebellious hearts, but the price of liberty still remains in strong battalions. Treatles are useless without the power available to enforce them. Notwithstanding all the safeguards that a higher civilization may provide, there will continue to come into the life of nations questions which will arouse so deeply the spirit of patriotism and the resentment of a whole people that those who continue the appeal for peace will be east out as traitors, and those who lead armies and fleets to victory will be heralded as heroes and their deeds commemorated in bronze and marble.

The American Army is, and of a right should be, maintained for the preservation of law and order within our own borders and to prevent aggression wherever floats the flag which in a world-wide journey has not lost its benediction. It is an imperative duty that our military resources shall be organized and nationalized, and that the doctrine of peace at any price shall not be permitted to confuse or retard the execution of that policy.

The greatest thing in life is service: to have served one's

The greatest thing in life is service; to have served one's country is the highest service. Amid all the foolish arguments of misguided and misinformed persons who think they are preaching peace, but who in reality are teaching anarchy, let us stand for our Nation's safety. Do not let teachers of low maxims of prudence and love of ease, masquerading as lovers of peace, prevail on us to keep our arm feeble. It was not so that Washington survived Valley Forge, or Lincoln won through to Appomattox.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Trison].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is said of old Cato that as he stood in his place from day to day addressing the Roman Senate he always concluded his speech with the familiar expression, as translated by us, "Carthage must be destroyed."

Cato was undoubtedly a patriot, and perhaps in regard to this particular hobby something of a nuisance. He saw what seemed to him the greatest menace to the safety of Rome and persistently thundered against it. Being, as I believe, a patriot, and desiring above all things else the safety and welfare of my country, I am going to take the risk of being also a nuisance if I may thereby impress one point which to my mind is not only important but absolutely essential in any adequate scheme of preparedness for national defense.

The greatest danger that old Cato saw was the rising power of the rival city of Carthage. In a world where might made right, if Carthage became the more powerful city, then Rome must suffer accordingly. No danger of that sort confronts us, but I do see a real danger that has not received the attention it should receive; in fact, is not generally realized by the people of this country. I refer to our shortage of arms and ammunition and the difficulty of securing them in sufficient quantities in case we should be called upon to face a great emergency. I not only point out the danger, which should be patent to every well-informed person, but I also point the way to an adequate and comparatively inexpensive remedy.

I have here to-day a number of articles, simply as illustrations of the subject matter of my remarks. In addition to the rifle, shrapnel, and time fuses, I have also a number of sample limit I am not going to explain the use of all of them, but gauges. simply give a general idea of the necessity for the appliances of which these are examples. You will note that one of these gauges is a large, yet delicate, complicated, and expensive affair. All of them and a hundred times as many would be necessary to turn out time fuses in quantities.

For more than a year I have urged the vital importance of this subject. Just about a year ago I stood on this floor and made the first speech on this subject in this House. I have made two or three more on the same subject since that time, and I promise you that until we have made further progress than we have thus far made in that direction I shall continue from time to time to make other speeches along the same line as I may believe they will be of service. In the national de-fense act of June 3, 1916, there was embodied an amendment introduced by me which authorized the procurement of gauges, dies, jigs, and other special appliances necessary in the manufacture of arms and anumunition. In the Army appropriation bill that followed, approved August 29, 1916, there was an appropriation of $450,000, as I recall, to purchase these appliances for the manufacture of small arms for the entire Army and of artillery ammunition for the National Guard. The fortification bill carried a million dollars for the same purpose to provide artillery ammunition for the Regular Establishment. Some progress has been made in the expenditure of these appropriations, but the difficulties are considerable and progress respondingly slow.

The question of possible war at the present time is a grave one. Let us squarely face the situation that would confront us in case such an awful calamity should befall this country. What would be our greatest need if war came to-morrow of such magnitude as to require an army of only 2,000,000 men? This would be less than one-tenth of our young manhood of military age, so that there should be comparatively little difficulty in securing this number. Having enrolled them, what should we do with them? With what weapons would they fight? No; if we were required to meet such an emergency, it would be not men, although that would be a need, but the greatest need of all and the most difficult to meet would be an adequate supply of arms like this I have here [United States service rifle] and of ammunition like that which you see on this table [artillery ammunition]. Those would be our two most serious needs. We are not prepared to manufacture either in large quantities.

We are not prepared to manufacture in sufficient quantities this service rifle which it would be necessary to place in the hands of every infantryman and cavalryman. We now have less than 800,000 of them all told. If we had an army of 800,000 men armed with this rifle we are not prepared to manufacture enough to supply the wastage alone. In other words, if we had 800,000 riflemen in active service, and should run our Government factories at full capacity, we should not be able to more than take care of the wastage unless we made further provisions for increasing the output.

What time would it take to get ready to manufacture rifles? We have a number of factories in this country, a very large number, that have modern machinery capable of being adapted to the manufacture of rifles. A number of them are to-day manufacturing rifles for use in foreign countries, but they are not prepared to manufacture our rifle, and it would take a considerable length of time to procure the necessary tools, special appliances, and inspection devices to produce our rifle. I have authority here in my hands for the statement that it would require at least 18 months to prepare even the factories that are to-day manufacturing rifles for foreign use to manufacture in large quantities our own rifle.

I wish to submit a number of statements from the report made by a board appointed under section 121 of the national-de-fense act on the subject of "Government manufacture of arms, ammunition, and equipment." The statements are in regard to The board finds that the rifle is the most difficult arm to secure.

The investigations of the board warrant the conclusion that the procurement of rifles presents greater difficulties than that of any other class of munitions. The large number of operations required, the accuracy demanded for the functioning of the parts, and the exceptional quality of steel that must be procured for barrels, the equipment of a plant, and the procurement of labor and supplies subject the manufacture of this arm to delays that might well be fatal.

Great Britain found the same thing. Here is what the Right Hon. Edwin Montagu, M. P., minister of munitions, said in a recent speech on the subject:

Rifles are more difficult to increase than any other munition of war.

* I understand rifles have always been the chief factor limiting the number of men who can be put in the field, and the best evidence therefore of the progress of rifle output is the size of the army that we are now able to arm and maintain overseas."

The report of the board referred to states the fact that-

The Springfield rifle has more than a hundred parts and it requires more than fourteen hundred distinct factory operations to produce the finished piece.

Fourteen hundred factory operations mean that there are required a like number of gauges to determine the accuracy of the parts produced by these fourteen hundred different operations. These, by the way, are gauges of the same general character and purpose as those here exhibited. A large number are required and absolutely essential not only to insure accuracy but also to facilitate manufacture. These devices themselves are difficult of manufacture and require a long time to produce. The board continues:

The experience of our most highly organized and best equipped plants in carrying out European orders for military rifies is a losson that our own Government should take to heart. The board can only speak of the results of its observations and of the frank statements of the officers of these plants in general terms. So speaking, it may be said that the lack of correct specifications and drawings followed by the lack of correct gauges, ligs, special fixtures, and tools not merely caused delay in arriving at a satisfactory output, but caused a large wastage of time and labor upon unsatisfactory products. The plants that are now turning out foreign rifies after two years of hard work have not yet reached their expected capacities. To turn these private plants from the manufacture of European rifies to the manufacture of the Springfield rifie would, if undertaken to-day, require not less than 18 months to get first results and at least 2 years to get capacity output. This is not my unsupported statement, but the report of a

This is not my unsupported statement, but the report of a board composed of Army officers and two civilians appointed by the President, who have gone into the subject thoroughly. The report of this board is quite recent, but is in entire accord with what I have been advocating before this House and the country for more than a year. The board says further:

There are now five plants manufacturing military rifles in this country but none of them is equipped to manufacture the Springfield rifle, and it would require a complete new set of gauges, jigs, fixtures, and tools to enable any of them to do so.

The British minister of munitions finds that the size of the army that can be put in the field is limited chiefly by the number of rifles available. It was doubtless so with Great Britain. We know that after the first expeditionary force was sent to Flanders Great Britain went ahead raising a larger army, but was unable to supply the men with rifles.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman speaks of factories being able to make other kinds of rifles than the Springfield rifle. Are these other rifles they are engaged in making as efficient weapons as the Springfield?

Mr. TILSON. In my judgment they are not as good. The Springfield is the best rifle made. I do not think there is any question about that. Its muzzle velocity is higher. It is a question about that. Its muzzle velocity is algher. It is a better rifle all the way through, but, in addition to that, it is absolutely necessary that there te interchangeability of ammunition and interchangeability of parts in the rifle. If we were called upon to go into war now, it might be the wisest thing for us to do to scrap our 800,000 of the best rifles in the world and turn to the use of rifles not so good, because a considerable number of plants are prepared to manufacture those rifles and are not prepared to manufacture our own,
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And our ammunition would not fit those others?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no. Understand that no ammunition that is made will fit the Springfield rifle except the ammunition specially made for it in this country.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And our reserve supply is of that class of ammunition?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. What is the make of that rifle you have in your

Mr. TILSON. This is the Springfield rifle; our own service rifle. I was about to say that we should learn the lesson of Great Britain in this matter, because I think it is impor-

Mr. HARDY. Could we not use the other guns while we were preparing to make the parts of the guns that we have?
Mr. TILSON. That might be the wiser way to do it, because we are prepared to make foreign ammunition and foreign rifles, and we are not now prepared to make our own in any large quantities.

Mr. HARDY. How did we get these 800,000 rifles if we did not make them ourselves? Mr. TILSON. We made them at about the rate of 200,000 or less a year, usually much less, but the lowest estimate of the annual wastage of rifles in the field is 40 per cent, and 100 The percentage of wastage has per cent is nearer correct. run as high as 150 per cent in some of the armies of Europe. If we suffered a wastage of 50 per cent, we could not increase at all, but should go downhill if we had to depend upon our own Government manufacture.

Mr. HARDY. Then a great many of our rifles are 4 and 5 and 6 and 7 and 8 years old?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. And there has been no improvement in the rifle since that time?

Mr. TILSON. In my judgment, there has been no improvement beyond this rifle. I think that is a safe statement.
Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. For a question. Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is not the gentleman mistaken in saying that we are manufacturing them to-day at the rate of 200,000 and that that is the capacity? Is it not true that if they were running on double shifts they would be able to make 400.0003

I did not mean to say that we are actually turning out 200,000 rifles a year, but at the maximum capacity I think the limit is something like 400,000 a year. Even that does not change the situation at all. However, our present output is very much below capacity.

Mr. HARDY. But it would prevent the scrapping of any of the arms we have. That would be sufficient to keep them in repair.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; we could take care of the rifles we have. Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. You would not use two sets of rifles in one brigade?

Mr. TILSON. It would be unsatisfactory and dangerous to attempt it.

Now, I desire to speak a little further of Great Britain's experience in regard to the expeditionary force, for it carries a lesson for us. As you know there was some diffi-culty—we do not know how much—in raising an army by the volunteer system in Great Britain. They finally succeeded in raising something like 3,000,000 men before the other system was adopted. I am not going into the question of the efficacy of the volunteer system at all, but at any rate they raised at least 3,000,000 men, only to find that there were not rifles enough to place in their hands. We have the statements of different officials of the Government to the effect that they were not able for more than a year to put rifles in the hands of 1 man out of every 10 that they could enlist. They came to this country seeking rifles. They came first to the large rifle manufacturing establishments in this country, offering all sorts of inducements for early deliveries. Time was the most essential elements of the effect that they could enlist. tial element of the contracts which they entered into. Our people, many of them not accustomed to the production of rifles on a large scale, made mistakes and accepted contracts which they could not carry out, because they were not equipped with the necessary appliances of which I am speaking. Some of the difficulties encountered are referred to in a statement made by a capable and experienced mechanical engineer, as follows:

The gauges first designed were generally inadequate; the tolerances and clearances allowed were not the best possible to insure economical assembling of the parts, with the result that a great many rejections were inevitable during the first months after production was attempted.

More important, however, was the fact that the capacity of the tool-makers in this country was less than one-tenth that required to produce the necessary gauges with sufficient accuracy, even if they had been correctly designed. The result was months of delay.

In short, manufacturers did not have these necessary things and it required time to make them, so that it took them a year and a half before the rifles were being delivered in quantities.

It is the same story in regard to artillery ammunition. Before the present war began, no one, unless it was the Germans, had any conception of the amount of artillery ammunition that would be required for a great war. At Verdun the French alone in one day, of which we have reliable information, used 800,000 shells, which is more than our present entire reserve

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Could the gentleman yield me as much as five minutes additional?

I yield the gentleman five minutes more. Mr. McKENZIE.

Mr. TILSON. It is absolutely essential in order to make an attack in a modern war that the attacking party have an overwhelming amount of both shrapnel and high explosives. It is necessary that it be manufactured rapidly and in very large quantities, which is impossible without a large array of limit gauges and other special appliances. This does not look to be a very complicated affair [illustrating with a shrapnel shell], but it really is quite a complicated machine. This part alone, the time fuse that I hold in my hand—it is our common 21-seconds combination time fuse—requires 235 different gauges like this and this [illustrating], and various other special tools like these, to make it. To procure gauges alone to turn out 1,000 fuses a day would cost approximately $100,000; but time fuses can not be made at all accurately or in large quantities without them. is imperative that the time fuse explode the shell at the right moment. All of its parts must be constructed with the utmost precision, requiring them to be inspected to a fine degree of accuracy, and they can not be inspected without the devices of which I am speaking.

In this bill we are saying to the War Department, "Go ahead with the purchase and manufacture of the essential appliances required in mass production of the most vital necessi-ties of modern warfare," which are small arms and ammunition and shells, both shrapnel and high explosive, for the Artillery. I asked the Chief of Ordnance in regard to the progress he is making in this direction. He admitted that he is progressing rather slowly under the appropriations made last year, owing to numerous difficulties. He added, however, that each gauge or other necessary special appliance accumulated he regarded as one more obstacle passed and out of the way.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman? I do not want to take up his time—

Mr. TILSON. Just for a question.
Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman believe we ought to abandon the giving of contracts to private manufacturer:?

Mr. TILSON. I do not.

Mr. BORLAND. And hold ourselves wholly to Government manufacture?

Mr. TILSON. Quite the contrary. Not that we should wholly abandon Government manufacture, which would be a great mistake; but in case of a great war, Government manufacture at best would be altogether inadequate, and it would be necessary to call upon all the private manufacturers of the country. That is just the point of my contention. The country is filled with manufacturing plants having an abundance of up-to-date machinery capable of being readily adjusted to the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and parts thereof. All that is lacking are the specially designed gauges, jigs, dies, and fix-tures. With these necessary articles ready in advance, it is only a matter of a few days to transform an industrial plant into a munitions factory. It has been done in Great Britain, so that there are 4,000 plants formerly engaged in a wide variety of peaceful industries now making munitions of war. The articles in question are useful only in the manufacture of war materials. Consequently no private plant had them. The Government did not have them. In the stress of war two years were consumed in precuring them. Manufacture of the consequence of th consumed in procuring them. Meanwhile the production of the most vital necessities for carrying on war was delayed. My plea is that we should take this lesson to heart and profit by it. Let us procure these essentials in time of peace, hoping all the while that peace may be vouchsafed to us forever, but at the same time be prepared to meet effectively any untoward emergency.

It is easy to foretell just what would happen in case of war. With a great rush and without much consideration Congress would place at the disposal of the President a great many millions of dollars. Representatives of the executive departments would soon be hurrying in hot haste to and fro, up and down the country seeking, reckless of cost, the very things I am now urging that they procure at reasonable expense in advance. it wise, is it safe, to wait till a crisis is upon us before taking such a reasonable precaution to meet it?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I wish the gentleman to be sure of its getting into the RECORD that due to his efforts an appropriation of $200,000 was made in the last bill. Now, will the gentleman tell the committee whether or not any of it has been used for this very important purpose?

Mr. TILSON. There was $450,000—I beg the gentleman's pardon—one item of $250,000 and one of $200,000. They have used a part of it, but they have encountered some difficulties, as I have stated, and must encounter them, whether in peace or war. My idea is that we can better afford to meet and overcome such difficulties in time of peace.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. For a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he is not mistaken about any of it being used. They have not used any of it, according to the latest reports, for these jigs, dies, and gauges.

Mr. TILSON. I understand that they are proceeding with the preparation of the designs and making a study of the re-quirements of the situation. The estimates and the testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs indicate that they will be able during the next two years to use the $400,000 asked for in this bill. I wish to say in behalf of the entire member-ship of the committee that they have given gladly every cent the department has said it could use.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I want to say to the gentleman that I am in thorough accord with him on that subject, and I think the whole committee is.

Mr. KELLEY. Is the capacity of the munition plants of the country very great for making English rifles?

Mr. TILSON. It is considerable. Mr. KELLEY. A good many thousand every day?

Mr. TILSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. KELLEY. Would it take long to fit up these factories with the machinery you speak of?

Mr. TILSON. The report of the board to which I have referred says 18 months. They would have to make all these things new. Our ammunition would not fit their rifles or their cannon. We have different calibers from theirs. Everything is different. They would have to begin almost new. There is this very great gain, however, in the fact that we should know where the machinery is that would make good rifles and shrapnel. I know that some of it is out in the gentleman's State, for I have seen it working out there turning out shells for a foreign belligerent. My aim and hope is to see our own country pre-pared to utilize on short notice our great industrial resources for our own national defense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend and revise to some extent my remarks, as I have not been able to put into my remarks all that I would like to

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi). The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After The Chair hears none. a pause.T

Mr. GARDNER, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD, which I made on this bill vesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, made on the bill yesterday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none,

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Morrison].

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Morrison] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] made a reference to Mr. Bryan and his action in the face of the conditions that confront the country now, and I endeavored to interrupt him to ask him a question, but he declined to yield. Later I asked two minutes in which to address the House on the same question and again that opportunity was denied me. So I take the opportunity now before I begin my address upon the bill before the committee to ask again the gentleman from Massachusetts, who I see is here, whether or not he voted for the Navy appropriation bill which lately passed the House?

Mr. GARDNER. No. I was in New York, and I telephoned over to Mr. Roberts of Massachusetts, or made inquiries through the telephone clerk, of Mr. Roberts, and he said he had a great quantity of votes and it was absolutely unnecessary for me to come over. Whereupon I asked to be paired in its favor. I asked them to get me a general pair, which they did.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] introduced an amendment to that bill, as follows:

On page 60, after line 23, insert: "It is hereby reaffirmed to be the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation or arbitration, to the end that war may be honorably avoided."

I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he agrees to that amendment?

Mr. GARDNER. I will say to the gentleman that I should have raised a point of order against that, and it would have gone out. It is absolutely and historically untrue. We never had such a policy

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that that was inserted without controversy?

Mr. GARDNER. Absolutely without controversy, because people did not know what was being said.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to call the gentleman's attention-

Mr. GARDNER. It is absolutely of no consequence, anyway. Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman may think it is of no conse-

Mr. MANN. It was inserted in the naval bill of last year. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was in the House when it was adopted without a dissenting vote, and there was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. And we have never used arbitration in order to prevent war.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield the floor long enough-Mr. GARDNER. That is for the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Shallenberger] to say.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the same thing was inserted in the naval bill last year, the current law, without any opposition from anybody at that time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am aware of that fact, and therefore I wanted to be sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts opposes that amendment. Mr. Bryan has devoted his whole life to the thing at issue right now in this dispute—to the sentiment and idea contained in the Mann amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. The issue with the President, who is not advocating mediation and arbitration. Is that what you meant?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is not what I meant, and that is not the question at issue here. I would like to say that those of us who know Mr. Bryan in Nebraska know that one of the chief reasons that induced him to take a position in the Cabinet, and he has stated it often, was the hope that he might have the honor of bringing about arbitration treaties between this Nation and the rest of the world. The charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts in his speech on yesterday was that Mr. Bryan was "trying to tear the Nation asunder." has stated both publicly and privately that he considered it as perhaps the greatest honor ever permitted to him in his life when he was permitted to prepare and negotiate 30 arbitration treaties whereby we would be enabled to settle international disputes in accordance with the precepts of this particular amendment rather than on the battle field.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield

there?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. Mr. GARDNER. Was Mr. Bryan able to make one of those treaties with Germany?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He was not,

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that if the gentleman from Massachusetts disagrees with this amendment, he is in disagreement with this House and in disagreement with his own party, as shown by the roll call on that bill. The naval bill is the most important national-defense measure passed in the American Congress; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, the most ardent advocate, and I will say an able one, of a policy of preparedness on the part of the Nation, was here to do his duty when the bill was voted upon. House by a vote of 340 to 22 passed the bill. The arbitration amendment was in the bill and that is the thing that Mr. Bryan has stood for during all these years.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman think the House is 340 to 22 against the proposition of the President on this question of submarine warfare?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I know the House is with the President, but I also know that arbitration is the policy this House voted for.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENGERGER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe with the Washington Times that this amendment was inserted in the bill surreptitiously?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No. On the contrary, I believe that this amendment was inserted in the bill openly and with the full knowledge of the membership of the House here. I can not consider it as having been done in any other way.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have been somewhat maligned myself on some of these matters, and I believe that a great injustice has been done to Mr. Mann, one of the ablest citizens of the United States, one of the truest patriots of this country; and also an injustice has been done to this House when such an editorial as that was published in the paper mentioned. Such slanders of public men are a disgrace to the newspaper profession, and to American civilization as well.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman does not believe it would be possible to sneak such an amendment into the bill without the House understanding what it was?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No, sir. I do not believe it for a

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Can the gentleman explain how this important amendment could be passed without our having any information on it beforehand?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That was because it was the opinion of the House it should be adopted.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the House usually remain silent when a matter is brought up in which the House is vitally interested? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It is, when the matter, in the opinion of the whole House, ought to go in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The same proposition was contained in the naval bill which was passed a year ago. It is the current law. I offered my amendment in about the same place in the bill when we reached about the same place in the naval bill this year.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; the same as it was before. Mr. MANN. Anybody watching the proceedings with respect to the naval bill and attending to business and knowing about the matter would have been informed.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I have referred to this matter because Mr. Bryan is not here to speak for himself. If he were here, he would not need me as a feeble advocate for him.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that this amendment spoken of was subject to a point of order, and one objection would

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the rule and custom of the House is that the man in charge of a bill shall protect that bill from extraneous matter. are many of us who are required to be almost constantly in committee, and therefore do not have the opportunity to make the objections that they would make if they were on the floor, and we must go on the assumption that extraneous matters will not be introduced into a bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not think that extrangous matters should be introduced into a bill.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. When that amendment was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] I went to Mr. Padgett, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and suggested that he make a point of order against it, and he said, "I do not care anything about it."

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He accepted it.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] charged that Mr. Bryan was "tearing the Nation assunder" by advising arbitration rather than war as a settlement of international disputes. I do not myself sub-scribe wholly to that doctrine. There are things I would not arbitrate. If Germany deliberately sinks our ships upon the high seas, with loss of American lives, in the face of the President's solemn warning, then there is nothing but the arbitrament of arms left to us in honor. But the charge is implied that Mr. Bryan is not standing by the President. I believe he is and will continue to stand by him in peace or in war. He has stood by him when he needed support in times past, and he will do so as a patriot in the future. He will not fail him in the hour of war, if war must come, any more than he has failed him in time of peace.

Now, there is a sharp division of opinion between Mr. Bryan and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] at this time as to what should be our national policy. Mr. Bryan is a man of great personal magnetism and courage, and I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts is the same. They both re-sponded to the call to arms in the Spanish-American War and were willing to go forth and die for their country; and although I believe they are passed military age now, their patriotism and courage are such that they would do so again if their country called. Mr. Bryan, with his great personal influence throughout the country, is doing the best he can to keep our country out of war, whereas the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to be close the best he can to keep our country. to be doing the best he can to good this country into war, and I am willing to abide by the verdict of the country as to which of these two gentlemen is serving his country the best in this time of peril. Mr. Bryan went into this struggle to keep the country out of war. He may meet defeat here, as he has met defeat many times before. But defeat does not destroy a great It takes a real man to suffer defeat and then rise again, as Mr. Bryan has repeatedly done. He has been defeated three times for the highest office in the world, the Presidency of the United States; and although thrice defeated for a prize more valued than any that ever crowned a king, his name will live in the history of his country and in the hearts of his countrymen when those who berate and slander him here are forgotten forever. [Applause.]

That is all I have to say about that. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the bill which is pending here.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman right here?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Right in connection with what the gentleman says about the defeat of Mr. Bryan, may I add a word that Mr. Bryan uttered on the morning of his first political defeat?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes. Mr. FIELDS. That those who fight for the right may be defeated, but they are never conquered. They may suffer reverses, but they never suffer failure. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The first-line troops must not only be trained, but organized into fighting units, and this is the deliberate judgment of the highest authority we have in this Having now the statement of the General Staff as to what they say our military policy must be, I, as a member of that committee, felt it no more than right that for the information of this House and the country the General Staff should give to us an estimate of what that policy was going to cost this Gov-ernment, so I submitted seven written questions to the Chief of the General Staff asking for definite information as to what this was going to cost. We know that the system we have now is going to cost a lot of money. We have appropriated more in the last 12 years than Germany spent before she became engaged in the war in Europe.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman will admit, however, that that is due to the comparatively large salaries that we pay to the soldiers as compared with what Germany pays.

Mr. HOWARD. To the officers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The pay amounts to only about one-sixth of the cost of the Army.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress will appropriate a billion of dollars more for national defense than did the Congress that preceded it. I believe that we might just as well face the fact that in the future war expenditures will total something like a billion of dollars a year. The expenditures for the Army and the Navy will therefore absorb all the revenues derived by the Government from taxation, and the Nation will have to finance itself in the future by the issue of bonds, never to be paid, but the interest upon them will remain as a constant charge upon the revenues of the Government. This has been the inevitable result in every country which has adopted a policy of complete military and naval preparedness in time of peace. If we are to match ourselves against the strongest military nations of the world, we must pay the price. The great powers of Europe can claim at least as efficient and economical management as ourselves, and none of them has escaped a constant increase in their national debts.

The bill that we are considering is the only one of the great military and naval supply bills to be reported at this session carrying a less sum than was appropriated for the same purposes at the last session. But, nevertheless, it is in effect an increase over the previous bill as it was reported by the Military Committee at the first session of this Congress. The bill reported by the Military Committee at the previous session carried almost one hundred millions of dollars less than the present bill when it was first brought into the House. As it finally became a law it carried two hundred and sixty-seven millions. If the awful calamity of war should result from the present international crisis, all previous appropriations for national defense will but constitute a drop in the bucket of the flood of wealth that will be poured out of the National Treasury. But we should not deceive ourselves into thinking that the Army and the Navy will not in the future demand larger and larger appropriations for their support in time of peace. In my opinion the Military and Naval Establishments will hereafter absorb all the revenues the people will consent to pay. The additional increments for the Regular Army and the National Guard, as already provided for in the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, necessarily demand increased appropriations for arms, munitions, material, and matériel, and these appropriations will continue to grow like Jonah's gourd. The appropriations by this Congress for national defense on land alone will exceed by $500,000,000 the amount appropriated for the same purposes in the Sixty-third Congress.

When the Regular Army reaches the maximum strength provided for under the so-called Hay bill and the National Guard is increased to 420,000 men, as is contemplated under that law, the cost of maintaining those units, added to the expense that will be required for our fortifications and coast defenses, will total a sum of $500,000,000 a year. And yet any student of modern military development knows that if we are to maintain a system that will in any degree equal those of the great governments of Europe, which have gone into the war game, with the idea of developing the full fighting strength of the Nation, our military policy will have to be entirely changed.

This is not a statement of my own opinion, but on page 773 of the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee, upon this very bill, Gen. Scott, our Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States, speaking for the organization of which he is the head, stated that after long study of the situation in the light of the experience gained from the war in Europe—and I quote the conclusion of the War College Division, which is concurred in by the remainder of the War Department Staff, is that our system should now be able to furnish 1.500,000 trained organized troops at the out-break of war and 1,500,000 additional in 90 days.

The first line of troops must not only be trained but organized as well—that is, actually organized into fighting units. This is the deliberate judgment of the highest military authority which we have in this country. We know that the system we have now is going to cost a lot of money. We have appropriated more in the last 12 years than Germany spent before she became engaged in the war in Europe.

Having the statement from the General Staff as to what they believe the safety of the Nation required for a proper military defense, it seemed to me that the Committee on Military Affairs and Congress as well ought to be informed as to what the cost of such a military establishment would be to the Nation, should we conclude to put this plan into actual being. I therefore asked the Chief of Staff to furnish us a statement as to the probable cost of their plan. So far this statement has not been furnished the Military Affairs Committee, but I have made some estimates of my own, only partial, of course, but based upon actual tables and data furnished as to the cost of the difapon actual tables and data furnished as to the cost of the dif-ferent units of our present Army for arms, munitions, material, materiel, and so forth. I am sure these figures will be found very conservative and much under the mark as to what our actual military expenses will aggregate in time of peace, if the plan proposed by Gen. Scott is carried out. The ques-tions submitted to the Chief of Staff, in my endeavor to ascer-tain the cost of putting the proposed plan for a military estabtain the cost of putting the proposed plan for a military establishment into practice, were as follows:

Mr. Shallenberger. I should like to have, first, the cost of artillery of all calibers and ammunition, both for annual use and a suitable reserve of ammunition for all calibers for an army of that size.

Second. The cost of rifles and ammunition for yearly use and the necessary reserve of rifles and ammunition for rifles for 3,000,000 men. Third. Quartermaster's supplies, including uniforms and complete field equipage for an army of 3,000,000 men and cost of subsistence, transportation, and expense of annual field maneuvers, and all other necessary expenses of the Quartermaster's Department to maintain an army of 1,500,000 in being.

Fourth. Cost of necessary aeroplanes, including reserve matériel and equipment for field service of a sufficient number of aeroplanes for an army of 3,000,000 men.

Fifth. Cost of equipment and maintenance of an engineering corps sufficient for an army of 1,500,000 men, as demonstrated necessary by the experience of European nations in the present war.

Sixth. Cost of the pay of officers and enlisted men for an army of 1,500,000 troops maintained in field condition and ready for service, together with a reserve of 1,500,000 men sufficiently trained to be ready for battle service in 90 days.

Gen. Scott. Yes, sir.

Mr. Shallenberger. I should like to have those costs; that is all.

The cost of equipment for an army of 3,000,000 men, which I have estimated for, is based upon the above table.

The estimates which I have here submitted are in line with the questions asked of the General Staff. In the first place, the system proposed by Gen. Scott contemplates the retention of our present Military Establishment, so far as the Regular Army is concerned, after it shall have been increased to its maximum strength under the national-defense act. tenance of this force will entail a cost of at least $350,000,000 a year. This is fully and plainly set forth by Gen. Scott on page 791 of the hearings of the Military Committee upon this bill. His positive statement is that the Regular Establishment of the national-defense act will be needed as an expeditionary force and to garrison and maintain our domestic and foreign fortifications.

On page 349 of the Infantry Journal of December last is given a table in detail of the cost of arms and equipment for field army, the cost of each arm of the servce, and the Engineer Corps as well. It is as exact as any that I could obtain. On the same page is given a table of percentages of the officers of the different field and staff corps of the Army.

Taking these percentages as a basis, we find that our Army should consist roundly of 48 per cent Infantry, 20 per cent Cavalry, 28 per cent Field and Coast Artillery, and about 4 per cent Engineers, and so forth. With these tables accepted as a basis, I find the cost of equipment alone for an army of 3,000,000 men would be $2,576,000,000. If these figures seem excessive, please remember that every Army expert who has appeared before the Military Committee has agreed that all field equipment, including arms and munitions, must be on hand when war starts, or the war may be over before they can be obtained. Just as Col. Tilson has stated, an army without necessary fighting material is no army at all.

The amount stated is only the cost of equipment for actual needs before war begins. There must also be a reserve of all those things essential for the maintenance of an army in the field, or the effectiveness of that army will be gone in a few days of fighting. The Treat Board, which was composed of Army officers selected for the purpose of determining the amount of reserve of artillery and artillery ammunition necessary for an army of 1,000,000 men, reported that such an army would require reserves to the value of $480,000,000 in artillery and artillery ammunition. The appropriations now being made for re-serves of artillery and ammunition for our present Army are based upon the report of this board.

Accepting these figures as our basis, an army of 3,000,000 men would require a reserve three times as large as that recommended by the Treat Board. This would mean an investment of $1,440,000,000 in artillery and artillery ammunition. The wastage in field equipment and arms is enormous in actual war. A reserve of at least 25 per cent must always be maintained of field equipment and small arms and ammunition, and this for an army of 3,000,000 men calls for at least a billion more of reserve supplies. So we have for arms, equipment, ammunition, and reserves for an army of 3,000,000 men, ready for action in 90 days, as the General Staff has declared we must have, a total of $5,016,000,000. This estimate does not include pay or the cost of subsistence, transportation, maneuvers, quarters, or the hundred other expenses that make up an Army appropriation

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Those figures are staggering to me. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes; and I will give the gentleman others that will stagger him more.

Mr. FESS. We could probably raise the money, but how are we going to raise the men?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is a proposition that we will have to consider later.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For a question. I have only five minutes

Mr. BORLAND. If equipping an army becomes imperative, had we not better direct our attention to getting good results for our money

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

The War Department recommends a period of eight years for securing the reserves contemplated by the Treat Board. Distributing the appropriations to provide equipment, armament, and reserves for the Army, contemplated by the General Staff plan, over a period of 10 years would necessitate appropriating $500,000,000 a year. Add to that amount the cost of the Regular Expellightent which Gen. Scott states must be maintained. lar Establishment, which Gen. Scott states must be maintained, and the cost sums up $850,000,000 a year. Add to that the cost of pay, transportation, subsistence, and all other necessary expenses for the Army of 500,000 citizens to be always maintained in the field by compulsory service, as the General Staff plan contemplates, and the cost will easily amount to a billion dollars a year for the Army alone.

We may be sure that the arms, armament, and equipment required will have to be renewed every 10 years, because it is in present practice renewed oftener than this. If these figures seem somewhat excessive as an estimate of our probable military expenditures for the future, just compare for a moment the advance in those expenditures as appropriated for by this Congress with those voted by the last. We must remember that we have only started upon the road to complete military preparedness, as advocated by those who are shaping the destinies of this Nation to-day. Resist as much as some of you may, the expenditures for the Army and Navy will continue to grow greater and greater as the years advance, unless the whole world changes its policy and ideas upon the subject of war.

For the year 1916 you appropriated $300,000 for aviation and $150,000 for machine guns. This Congress will appropriate almost one-half as much for these two items alone as was the entire cost of the Army for the fiscal year 1916. I have taken the time of the House to read these estimates and comparisons as to the probable expenditures in the future for military preparedness, to give some foundation for the idea that I desire to advance.

The vast sums of money voted for national defense are appropriated under our present system with a lack of accurate knowledge upon the part of both Congress and of committees that is monumental in its magnitude and is bound to result in a wastefulness of public money that would appall our constituents if they really understood it. We are spending billions of public funds upon the request, either in person or by letter, of department clerks and bureau chiefs who are interested mainly in the matter of securing the greatest possible expenditure of money by their departments. Possibilities of pay and promo-tion are always potential factors in determining the size of appropriations asked for by every department of this Govern-

I believe that every member of the Military Affairs Committee of this House feels that we have to pass upon hundreds of millions of expenditures for the Military Establishment of this Government about which we have not sufficient knowledge to act intelligently. We have the same machinery to determine and decide the Government's expenditures for the Army and Navy that we had a few years ago when we voted about one-fourth the amount of public money for national defense that we are spending at present. Committees are fighting for jurisdiction as to appropriations for thirty or forty millions of dollars for aeroplanes and antiaircraft armament about which none of them has any accurate knowledge either as to efficiency, cost, or need. The same thing is true as to artillery, ammunition, machine guns, and all military materiel.

Here are some examples of results under our present system taken from the records of hearings had before the Military Committee of the House.

The service rifle which the soldier carries with him into battle is the most important weapon with which an army fights. No other single arm compares with it in effectiveness in battle.

The Chief of Ordnance states that an army of a million men would require 1,250,000 rifles to properly arm it. An army of 3,000,000 men would therefore require more than 3,500,000 rifles. We have at present 700,000 service rifles-about half enough to properly equip an Army of 1,000,000 men.

No manufacturer in the United States is equipped to manufacture a single rifle such as our Army uses, nor could they produce them in quantities in less than a year's time. Therefore the only source of supply we have is the Government arsenals.

They have a capacity of at least 600,000 rifles a year.

Notwithstanding the fact that the war in Europe has been going on for more than two and a half years, "sparks have been flying," and we have been constantly on the "verge of war," in three years we have added less than 25,000 rifles a year to our

The actual figures showing the number of rifles manufactured are: In 1914, 26,545 rifles; in 1915, 25,972; and in 1916, with the war in Europe still coming closer to us, we manufactured and secured 13,628 rifles; or in three years we have added 66,000 rifles to our reserves

One of the wonders of this war has been the development of large caliber field howitzers and mortars that are used in countless thousands on the battle lines of Europe, and without which modern infantry, intrenched in ditches and armed with machine guns and military repeating rifles, could not be dislodged but could hold their positions indefinitely.

If our troops were required to dislodge an intrenched enemy with the field artillery we now have, they would find it an impossibility except at the end of frightful slaughter. The heaviest calibered field artillery we have is a 6-inch howitzer, throwing a shell weighing 120 pounds, and never designed to be used against modern intrenchments, and we have not enough high-explosive shells of that caliber to keep the guns we have in action for a week. If large-caliber mobile guns, throwing high-explosive shells at high angles, are essential for driving men out of modern intrenchments, and every military authority says they are, then we have not made much progress in three years in this direction, with the example of the war in Europe constantly before us. We have not manufactured a single gun of heavier caliber than 6-inch.

The third astonishing development of this war has been in the increased use of the automatic machine rifle. The record shows we had last year ten hundred and seventy-seven machine guns of various varieties. The bill for 1916 carried an appropriation of $150,000 for machine guns, but none were purchased or manufactured. Last year Congress voted $12,000,000 for ma-chine guns. This would have purchased 16,000 machine guns of the Lewis or Colt type, which are being used in thousands in actual battle by the English, French, Belgian, and Russian Armies, and now being manufactured in the United States by thousands every month.

The machine-gun board recommends the purchase of 17,283 guns in three years. We gave them enough to buy 16,000 gasoperated machine guns last year, and they actually purchased 353. Over nine millions of last year's appropriation has been contracted for to be used in payment for 4,000 heavy machine guns, requiring four water tanks with each gun, from a company which has never yet manufactured a single gun of the kind we have contracted for, nor does anyone know when they will be able to deliver them. It is bound to be in the future at the best, and no one is certain that a gun such as the Army will accept will be gotten under this contract.

The above is our record for the past three years, as I have been able to obtain it, as to our achievements thus far in preparing for the possibility of war in the matter of securing rifles, heavy field artillery, and machine guns, the three most essential arms with which to equip men for battle.

Mr. KELLEY. Can the gentleman tell me how long it took the Remington Arms Co. to make the English rifle after they got the order?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The information given the committee was that it took about 18 months. We talk about getting an army trained. We will have to have 3,000,000 men if we go into that European war, if we do anything worth while. A colonel from Kentucky or New York or some other place the other evening—Col. Harvey, I believe—made a speech in this city, and in it he said that he wanted to send our Regular Army of 100,000 men to that European battle line, and told of how those people would cheer when they saw that 100,000 men coming to battle, and how their hearts would leap, and all that sort of thing; but, Mr. Chairman, England has sent 5,000,000 men to that battle line, France has sent 7,000,000 men to the battle line, and Russia has sent 10,000,000 men, and they have not been able yet to make a dent in the German line, if that is the line that you are going to fight. We will have to put millions of men into the European war if we are going to turn the tide of victory. We will have to train them before they go to that battle line, but we will have plenty of time to train them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not yield. If we finally get these guns, we will have plenty of time to have the boys trained, but we will have to train them with something else than rifles.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I think it is only fair to the record to show the truth. The gentleman is talking about the number of rifles. It is true we have not been manufacturing many. Why? Because we have many more rifles than we have men or any immediate prospect of getting men, and there was need of other kinds of munitions.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The record shows that we have contracted for and purchased about 250,000 pistols—popguns insected of rifles.

When their military expenditures had grown to enormous proportions other nations found it necessary to adopt an efficient business system for handling the public's money in the matter of war expenditures. England created a department of munitions. The strongest man in the empire was given the place of minister of munitions. It revolutionized the policy of the Government and put efficiency and economy to the fore. I firmly believe we will have to adopt some such plan in the matter of expenditures of our money for public defense or else our waste will be enormous. If you say that England's action was in time of war, why should we not avail ourselves in time of peace of the lesson she had to learn by bitter experience in time of trial and stress? We are simply deluging the different departments of the Army and the Navy with the flood of money. Having never had to handle expenditures of such tremendous magnitude before, being suddenly given more money than they ever dreamed existed, they are really put to it to find a place to even give it away. It is my opinion that a committee of Congress having control of the purchase and manufacture of all munitions and supplies both for the Army and the Navy should be constituted by Congress. It should have jurisdiction over all appropriations for arms, armament, material, and materiel.

This would require, of course, the establishment of a new committee, but I am firmly of the opinion that such a committee could properly inform itself as to the most economical and efficient means for supplying the needs of this Government in the matter of war material and direct the manufacture and purchase of war supplies so that the best interests of the Government and of the people, who pay the bills, would be served. The efficiency of our national defense program would be tremendously increased and the National Treasury saved from the waste of untold millions of money.

If something is not done in the future to more carefully supervise the expenditure of the billions that are going to be spent by coming Congresses upon the matter of national de-fense, we will probably discover what is somewhat apparent now—that while expenditures and appropriations grow by hundreds of millions at each succeeding session, our Army increases by thousands. Since we started to increase our Military Establishment for national defense our appropriations for the Army have increased four hundred millions and the Army has been increased by about 10,000 enlisted men of the line.

We can get everything for an army by appropriations except men. Without men we can have no army. We can get plenty of officers, eager for rank and thirsty for glory, but the lack is of officers, eager for rank and thirsty for glory, but the kings in fighting men for the line, ready to die in the ditch. Kings and princes have at times in the past found it difficult to get men to fight their battles for them. Napoleon Bonaparte, the wisest warrior the world ever knew, conceived the plan of universal conscription to fill his ranks, and when one nation had adopted that policy it compelled those who were its expected or possible adversaries to inaugurate the same system or be over-thrown. In the event of a war for national defense, this Nation will spend its last dollar and send the last man to the front. In such a war the United States will never be troubled to find soldiers for the fighting line. It will only be put to it to find guns and ammunition with which to arm them. It would be put to it to do so right now.

Militarists are always ready to pay any price for any kind of war material except the human unit, the man who fights the battle, the man who is the heart and the lifeblood of every Having to pay enormous prices for other war material, they purpose under the plan of compulsory service to pay nothing for the men. In war everything goes up in price except human life. The nations at war in Europe will send a man 5,000 miles across the sea and over the land, away out to western Nebraska, where I live, and pay me $150 in good red gold for a dinky horse that could command a price of perhaps $50 in time of peace. They will ship that horse back over land and sea to Europe, and when they get him to the battle line he has cost them six or seven hundred dollars and will live perhaps

But they will take the boy of Europe, the flower of his race the pride of his parents—they take him for nothing. They send him to the firing line and he is shot down. They pay him perhaps 7 cents a day while he lives. Seven cents for the boy; $700 for the horse. It is because I know that such things as this are the inevitable consequence of war that I hope that God may grant to our President the wisdom and the understanding to keep us free from its awful curse. We are at present free from the fearful problems that confront blood-soaked and war-weary Europe. We can show them the true way by example more surely than we can drive them to it by force of arms. There is room and stage here in this western world for this Nation to work out its final and triumphant destiny which, in my judgment, should be the leadership of the peoples of earth in commerce, in education, and in civilization,

Let Columbia still continue to sit here, enthroned between our silver seas, the Atlantic upon the east, the blue Pacific upon the west, "these seas which serve us in the office of a wall or as a most defensive against the envy of less happy lands." And to our future jubilee shall come, in the fullness of time when we hold it, not kings and princes as a relic of the imperialism, the barbarism, the despotism of the past; not conquered nations bound to our chariot wheels, as trophies of conquest and allconquering war, but rather the nations of the earth in peaceful procession, to sit at our feet and learn from a study of America's history the story of man's final emancipation from wrong and oppression and do Columbia reverence as the uncrowned queen of the highest, the freest, and the noblest type of civilization upon the face of the earth. That is the ideal which I hold for my country. That is mankind. [Applause.] That is the mission I would have her bring to

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Rucker].

Mr. RUCKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in 1869 I came to Washington from Princeton College to start life as a correspondent. I represented the Atlanta Constitution, the Augusta Chronicle, and the Mobile Register, then, as now, papers of influence, papers that have made and unmade many a man. They were ably edited, fair on all matters at issue, and they never struck below the belt. The gathering of news then was a different matter from now. Most of the news matter handled by correspondents was sent by mail, the more important being sent by wire, for the Western Union, then as now, was trying to make an honest living, and charges were quite high.

I sometimes wish, Mr. Chairman, I had stayed in the newspaper business, because all connected with the press seem so bright. I do not know whether they are bright because they are connected with the press or connected with the press because they are bright; but so it is. They have been kind to me since I have been here. [Applause.] May their tribe increase, and may the good Lord reward them according to their works. I hope they get better pay than we used to get. My recollection is I got $2 a day to start with, and when my talent became recognized the pay was raised by leaps and bounds to $3. [Laughter.] I know it enabled me to live in more or less splendor at what was then considered the fashionable hotel of the town—the Metropolitan. I fell so much in love with that institution that I am there to-day; and one of the things that makes the Metropolitan such an attractive place is the sense of security and repose which you enjoy when you get into the elevator. [Laughter.] It is the only thing in Washington I have found that goes slow, and I am inclined to think that the present one is the old one or its immediate successor. fare is excellent, the service good, and I have spent many a happy night within the walls of the dear, old Met. [Applause.]
I remember my first appearance at the White House. I accepted the invitation issued to another gentleman, borrowed a coat from one Member about my size, though it was rather a tight fit, and a pair of pants from a gentleman from Savannah. But my recollection is that my appearance was generally pleasing and commented upon favorably by certain Members who wanted favorable mention. I never went back on a friend, and loans were easily made. I made some to adjust the inequalities of fortune.

The press was a great power then, as now. Many things have occupied my attention since I have been here, but I know nothing I have looked for more carefully than what is said about me in friendly newspapers. I have cut out and have now in a precious scrapbook a volume I will pore over when I get home. The happiness the boys have given me they will never

In the days when I was in the gallery, Mr. Chairman, right over where you sit to-day, in the end nearest the east, there were not many correspondents. I suppose nearly all of them have gone to their reward, for I was the youngest member of the lot. Mr. Blaine was the Speaker of the House, and Mr. Colfax presided over the Senate. Gen. Grant was in the White House. I have seen him many a time on Pennsylvania Avenue, generally smoking, and always democratic and dignified. At the time I was here a great deal of heat was displayed in debate. Passions aroused by the war were at white heat. I remember as Members of the House and Senate Gen. Butler, Mr. Dawes, Mr. Bingham, Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Sumner, and Mr. Sargent. Then, as now, a few did the talking. [Laughter.]

The Democrats sat on the right of the Speaker and they were very small part of the body, but as intelligence has increased they have grown in membership until it looks like now they shall inherit the earth. I love my country and its institutions, and I love the women, collectively and individually, because they made possible the election of the gentleman in the White House who has no superior and, in my judgment, no equal save

Washington. [Applause.]

I remember the Georgia delegation then-a moderately fair aggregation. I was a great favorite with this bunch, if I may so characterize them, because I called attention only to those things that made for their good. I frequently helped them with their speeches, scissoring sharply, sometimes almost bodily producing speeches from the most ancient Congressional Records we could find. I was a great favorite and frequently lunched with them. It was whilst associating with them I learned to

[Laughter.]

At that time, Mr. Chairman, I have heard there was a barroom in the basement, a place then much frequented, and when some of the Members would get up to make a speech, and were obliged temporarily to be out of the bar, they had placed on obliged temporarily to be out of the bar, they had placed on their desks, in vessels you could not see through, what was called "cold tea." [Laughter.] I do not know as a matter of fact what was in these vessels, but a constant using of the contents produced a thickness of speech and an unsteadiness of Now, an enlightened public sentiment has run drink out of the Capitol, and I hear you can only get liquor at a near-by institution not owned by the Government but contiguous to Government property. [Laughter.] I trust we will get rid of it altogether, and if the Committee on the District of Columbia will bring the question of liquor in the District up in the House they will have a bill prohibiting liquor from the District passed by a large and overwhelming majority, say, 5 to 1. Even if a man wants a drink, he is not going to vote in a way to indicate his desire.

Mr. Chairman, I know of only three institutions that will be injured by putting liquor where the hand of resurrection can never reach it-the poorhouse, the penitentiary, the lunatic asylum-and I have no desire to see these institutions with a full house. Drink, Mr. Chairman, never brightened a home, never made a happy wife or mother, never gladdened the heart of a child, never made one of God's creatures wiser or better. And all of us want to make happy homes, I am sure. [Ap-

What do you want with liquor? Put it away-far away. is like a glandered mule in a stable of healthy stock, a cocklebur in young corn, crab grass drawing away the life from the cotton plant. Dig it up; hang it on the fence where the rains can drench it, the winds blow through it, and the sun burn it up.

They have got ashamed of the word "bar," which word is succeeded by the word "buffet"—but the poison is there all the same, simply sugar-coated—the poison is there. Buffet! A word to juggle with.

Burns summed up the philosophy of human life in this

To make a happy fireside climb for weans and wife. That's the true pathos and sublime of human life.

Mr. Chairman, I saw an article in the New York Sun, a paper that I read with more pleasure than any other-the smartest paper published on American soil-in which a gentleman suggested a commission to look into the question. To look into the question! Most questions have two sides, but the question of drink has but one. Human intelligence is staggered when taxed to give a reason why drink should stay in the land. I do not believe in fanatics; but no man can be a fanatic, in my judgment, on the liquor question. Oh, the woes it has caused, the lives it has blighted, the homes it has desolated! The only sad sight I have seen since I have been in Washington is the black Maria as it comes through the streets early in the morning carrying along the poor fellows troubled by drink. It is not these poor fellows alone who suffer, it is the mothers, the wives, the children, the friends. [Applause.]
Mr. Chairman, I have sometimes thought of this: Suppose every man when he starts to work in the morning would take the amount which in the progress of the day he will spend for liquor and throw it in the mouth of the first open sewer. What a stupendous sum it would be! More than a million dollars a day, and you might say here is waste, stupendous waste, and yet is that true? No; it would be far better for himself and for those whom God has committed to his care if he would make that disposition of the money, for what he gets does not help him, but tends to his destruction.

Oh, if we can look upon those we love who are coming after us and see them as they round into life with clear eyes and steady nerves, we can rest assured that no rough waters will swamp them and no reefs will mark their wreck, and it will be infinite happiness to those who love them when they can see these things, and we will be willing to go hence with a contented spirit because we will know those who are dear to us are safe.

When I announced for Congress, Mr. Chairman, there was some complaint by those who wanted to grumble that I didn't have a platform. They wanted me to issue a long platform like the others, but I told them I was not going to have a platform longer than the term, and they finally consented to take this view. [Laughter.] I told them I was going to do what was right, that they would be proud of me, and from the letters I am getting from my far-away home I am sure I am coming to time. I am thinking of the people at home. I am loving them because they have been good to me. They are a brave people, they pay their debts, they meet all requirements of good citizenship, they fear God and keep his commandments. They made themselves busy when I was making my race, sponging out my errors, trying to find some good. The campaign was a short one, and as they kept themselves busy in the work indicated they had the slate in pretty good shape on January 11, 1917.

I represent, Mr. Chairman, the most intelligent district on American soil, largely an agricultural district with a good sprinkling of manufacturing. You can tell a tree by its fruits. God bless the people of the eighth district. I love them, they love me, and may they keep in their present frame of mind. When any of you gentlemen desire to know about me you can refer to the Congressional Directory, page 19, in which I relate the more prominent events in my somewhat tempestuous life.

I do not see much difference between the Democrats and the Republicans; all of them are patriotic and they differ only when they vote. Whenever you see the Democratic majority dwindle, be assured the matter will be righted at the next assizes. It is simply a case of arrested mental development, which is subject to treatment. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, I want to express my love and admiration for our Speaker. I do not want to go hence without giving expression to it. I think of him in connection with the great things in nature-the big trees in California, the Everglades in Florida, the geyser spouts of the great Northwest, the Falls of Niagara, the hot springs of Arkansas, like the eagle he flies high and he blows his breath upon the sun. Framed in the prodigality of nature, the spacious earth may not again produce him. May he have what he deserves, and when he has that he will have more than he can ever desire. [Applause.] I used to think, Mr. Chairman, when my mind was immature and before I got here in this body-which is the repository of all wisdom-that the country, like fodder, had to be saved every year, but I know better now. When I see Mr. Mann on the one side and Mr. Kitchin on the other, each pulling apart, I know that the old ship is going straight. When I look at these gentlemen I am reminded of two steers, each one trying to pull the vehicle to his own side and through their united contrary efforts the wagon is kept in the middle of the road.

Mr. Chairman, if any complaint be made that this speech has no beginning and no middle, I desire to call attention to the fact that it has an end. I never lacked terminal facilities.

[Laughter.]

I know and feel now that when I have gone hence I will remember the pleasant days spent here—the happy days!

And, Mr. Chairman, when I leave here, before I go home,
I am going to New York to see my three grandchildren—Tinsley, Cason, and Embry. That a kind Providence may watch over, protect, and guide these little kids is the earnest prayer of their old grandchild. their old granddad.

And the same to a little baby granddaughter, Nellie Peters, whom I will find at home. [Great applause.]

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman use all his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute. Mr. KAHN. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I shall use the entire 15 minutes allotted to me, but I desire to make a few observations on this bill. In the first place, as a member of the minority I feel that I ought to say that we have appreciated the kindness and considerate treatment which we have received at the hands of our chairman [Mr. Dent] [applause] in the consideration of the bill now pending before you. When Congress convened in December the Committee on Military Affairs found itself confronted with the duty of making appropriations to take care of the national-defense act which we passed in the last session of Congress. Many new appropriations had to be made, and it was a considerable task to have the hearings and to get the bill ready to report to the House. When we started to consider the bill I stated, and I think it was the opinion of every member of the committee, that it was our duty to see that every branch of the national-defense act was properly taken care of by making appropriations sufficient in order that there might be no criticism of the committee. We have done that, in my judgment. We have not appropriated the limit asked for in some estimates, but we have tried to consider the matter from a business standpoint and to give every dollar that will be necessary to maintain and take care of the national defense for the year 1918. In the matter of the pay of the line of the Army, as was spoken of by the chairman of the committee on yesterday, I feel that we have made sufficient appropriation for that purpose, but I am reminded now of some things I said in this House when we were considering the national-defense act, when I said it would be utterly impossible to get the men to make up the authorized Army of the United States unless we raised the pay or resorted to conscription.

The truth of the statement I made at that time has been demonstrated by the fact that we have not got the men to-day, and I fear we will not get them. But this bill will take care of the men we have in the Army, and not only that, it will take care of the National Guard, the training in the schools, the summer camps, the Officers' Reserve Corps, and the hundred other things that are provided for in the national-defense act. And surely the committee can not be criticized for being little in the amount appropriated for the national defense. be some criticism, however, of our committee from the fact that we have not reported any substantive legislation, that we have not undertaken to change the national-defense law enacted at the last session of Congress. There may be some criticism of us because we have not reported a bill providing for universal mili-

Now, I want to say to you, gentlemen of the House, that so far I am personally concerned I feel that the reason for the failure to bring in any particular amendment to the nationaldefense act is not altogether with the committee, but that it rests particularly with the War Department and with the Secretary of War. And I want to say that, as I understand it, there will be an effort made in this Hopse to put some amendments onto this bill providing for the increase of the General Staff. Now, I wish to say here that so far as I am personally concerned I have been convinced by observing the operations of the armies in Europe that a strong general staff is the main reliance of an army. I think it has done more to keep Germany at the front than perhaps any other one thing in its military establishment. I am ready, and have been ready, if the War Department feel that they need a larger staff, to give it to them, but I wish to say to the House that the Secretary of War did not take the individual members of that committee into his confidence and neither did he come before us and say he wanted this legislation. Otherwise we might have reported such a proposition. But he submitted his proposition to our chairman, and he had certain views upon that matter, or felt the unwisdom of undertaking to report it, and he simply asked us to report the substitute, and so far as I am personally concerned I feel that the individual members of the committee are not responsible for refusing to bring in that sort of a proposition to the House. Another thing. We did not even take up the matter of universal military training or universal compulsory service, for the very good reason that no bill was submitted to us and for the further reason that we felt it was utterly impossible, a physical impossibility, to undertake to consider a measure of such importance in the limited time that we would have between now and the 4th of March.

Furthermore, I wish to say this, that heretofore I have felt that it would be turning our backs upon all the history of our country to depart from the volunteer system to that of compulsory military training or compulsory military service. [Applause.] But I believe, however, fellow Members of this House, that the people of this country are drifting toward universal military training and compulsory military service and that the military training and compulsory military service, and that the time is coming when we must report some such proposition to this House and let the Members determine whether or not it shall be adopted.

I further will say that I want the American people from now until the next Congress convenes to begin to study this great question. They should study it in all of its details. It is an easy matter to get up and say, "I believe in universal military training," or, "I believe in compulsory military service," but what is to be the concrete plan? Are we going to train all the young men of this country for six months or one year and at the same time maintain a large standing Army, at the same time maintain the National Guard, and at the same time train boys in school and at summer training camps?

Personally, if the volunteer system, which is now evidently on its last and final trial, shall fail under the national-defense act which we passed a few months ago, and we go to universal military training or universal military service, I am in favor of taking the boys and putting them in the Army for one year. I differ from my friend from Massachusetts, who undertakes to say that he favors military training but not compulsory service. I maintain if we are going to give up the volunteer system, let us have compulsory military service that means something. If we train a boy for a year in the Army of the United States, let him be subject to the call, and not train all the boys for a year and then when war comes only the heroes volunteer. want the son of the rich man under those circumstances to have to go to the war the same as the son of the poor man. [Applause.] If we are going to have it universal, let it be universal, with no exceptions, no exemptions, and let us stand squarely on that platform. That is where I stand on that proposition, and I believe, my friends, it is coming, and we might as well begin to think about it seriously and the plan we are going to adopt. Do not let us saddle onto the people of this country compulsory military training and all the additional expense that we are now putting the people to in this country to maintain what is called a deficient system of national defense. I am only in favor

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. McKENZIE. I have not the time.

I am only in favor, however, of preparing my country for national defense and for the protection of American rights. do not agree with Col. Harvey when he suggests that we send American boys across the seas to fight on the side of the allies. Fellow Americans, I am not in favor of taking the American boys and putting them into a conflict or a war between crowned heads. [Applause.] I am only in favor of training the American citizen to uphold our flag and defend our rights on land and on sea. I do not favor the proposition I have heard asserted on this floor that in order to maintain our rights against Germany we must become an ally of England, or in order to maintain our rights against England we must become an ally of Germany. [Applause.] We should take the position that we stand for American rights and not for some other country, simply as an excuse to maintain our rights.

Now, fellow Members of the House, I am not going to take any more time, and I will yield back the remainder of my time, if I have any left, to the chairman of the committee. [Ap-

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentle-

The CHAIRMAN. He yielded back four minutes. Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I will yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], a former member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to begin by expressing my great appreciation of the remarks of Mr. McKenzie you have just heard, with every word of which I

This bill is a bill that has two features. One is the maintenance or support of the Army, including the National Guard and the matters referred to in the national-defense act. The other part of the bill is perhaps much more important. It is the provision of arms and munitions which will enable us in case of an emergency to call our people to the aid and defense of our Government, to maintain peace and our rights as neutrals.

We have 21,000,000 men in this country between the ages of 18 and 45—the period defined by the fathers of the country under the provision of the Constitution which said that Congress should have the power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia." By the "militia" they meant all those people between 18 and 45 years of age. We have 21,000.000 of them.

Now, we should provide for arming them. We have now, instead of 21,000.000 rifles, 400,000 Krags and about 300,000 or 350,000 Springfields, besides the 250,000 which are held by the Army and the National Guard.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARKER of Now Jersey. Leak that the gentleman do.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask that the gentleman do not interrupt me now. I will give him time afterwards. I am dealing with figures now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is all that we have. The Congress did well last session. They provided $5,000.000 instead of $250,000 for the manufacture of rifles. Instead of making 12,000 rifles, we can now make 300,000 a year when our factories get thoroughly to work. I believe they are making only 200.000 a year new, but with 300,000 a year it will take 70 years of taking the boys and putting them in the Army for one year. before we can supply the able-bodied population of this country I am not in favor of simply giving them military training, and with a rifle apiece. We ought to make more rifles, because we may have to call out our people, even if our Navy holds off the enemy a year or so, in perhaps a year or two years. We have not the factories to do this. There are factories making English rifles, but they are of a different caliber. They will not use our cartridges; and dies, gauges, and jigs have to be made before they can make rifles for our ammunition.

It is about the same with reference to field guns; perhaps worse. There is $12,000.000, I believe, appropriated for field guns in the fortification bill and $10,000,000 in this bill. As I understand the cost and number of field guns required for the mobile Army, according to the last report, we make enough field guns for about 100,000 men a year, which would supply the 21,000,000 men in 210 years. It is not enough, if you are looking toward emergencies. It is the same with ammunition. I will not go into details. I am stating round figures.

But there is another thing you want to do. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKenzie] has spoken well of the different systems of training our youth. One way is to have compulsory military service for every man who becomes 19 years of age. There are over 800,000 of them every year, and they are to go into a reserve, so that they can not pass the rifles on from one year to the next.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can not yield.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Would the gentleman withdraw that point? I do not want the House to be disturbed in that way. I did not mean to be offensive, I will yield if desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-four Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Saunders, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called, whereupon 325 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER. A quorum having appeared, the committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr.

PARKER] will proceed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. However unwilling I have been that the House should be delayed by the roll call, I suppose I ought to thank the gentleman from Texas for getting an audience for me. 1 was saying that we had no rifles or munitions for our 21,000,000 able-bodied men, and could not get them for 70 or 100 years at the present rate; that we had not enough for the 800,000 young men of 19 years of age who would come out yearly under the proposed system of military training. We have not enough, if we want to train our 5,426,000 boys between the ages of 15 and 20. There are nearly 1,800,000 of them in the common schools. There are also 673,000 in public There are 250,000 in the colleges, and private high schools. There are 75,000 or 100,000 in professional schools. In the name of military training, are we going to call our men to arms without any arms to give them, as England did when for two years she could not send her men forward because of the lack of arms? Are we going to pretend to have military training without arms, whether in our schools or outside? Gentlemen talk of the Swiss. The Swiss have only a short military training in the field, but for four or five years they receive military training in their schools, and when a man gets through with his training in the camp he is given his rifle, and he takes it home and keeps it in his house as a freeman until he is past the age of military service, and he is always ready to turn out with his gun at any moment. That is what makes for peace. But we can not have that training without arms.

It is still more so as to officers. We sent 150,000 men down to the border recently. They were called the National Guard, but it is not fair to put all their faults on the National Guard. The National Guard has a peace strength under the statute which is only half its war strength. That is all wrong. peace strength ought to be double the war strength, so that we could call only the younger men to go to the front, and still have the benefit of the older men to help train the younger men and to help take care of riots and for home duty. But the result of that peace strength of 50 men to a company, with more than 100 men to a company when they got to the border, was that they sent a lot of boys down there, real good fellows, who knew nothing whatever of military service, and the question was where to get men to train them. We had no Regular Army officers to spare, because all their companies had been enlarged at the same time, and every one of them was needed with his own company and could not go to train the militia. We had not the trained graduates of West Point, nor the men trained in the work of an army, to take care of the 150,000 of our National Guard. What would we do if we had to take care of 900,000 men and they were asked to come out next year to be trained, all 19 years of age and all knowing nothing about war? And what would we do if we ordered our school-teachers to train their boys? Where are the military teachers for those schools to give them real training? And half training is worse than none, because a man who is half trained thinks he knows it all, and the man who has no training does not think so. We need trained military men in the community. We do not want shoulder straps. I believe that the one remedy, next to providing arms, is to establish military academies like West Point, under the same discipline and drill, that would have 50,000 boys in them, who, when they graduated, would be ready either to take command of an army of volunteers called into the field or to take charge of military training in our schools. Those 50,000 cadets would be an army in themselves, and could have maneuvers of themselves every three months in the summer. They could have maneuvers such as we have never seen before, and would introduce the large tactics as well as the full training. It is tools and teachers, brains and arms, that we need if we are to defend the country in an emergency, and it is with that view that I look on this bill rather than on the question of the splendid little Army that we have.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. EMERSON. I see the gentleman has a great deal of knowledge and experience on the subject. I would like to ask him what is a trained soldier?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman mean officer or man?

Mr. EMERSON. A man. Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. A man is a trained soldier who knows how to shoot straight, to obey orders, and to get there. He needs to be able to march 30 miles a day, to shoot straight whether he is firing by volley or by himself, and he needs to know how to obey orders. It takes some time to teach that.

Mr. EMERSON. About how much time should it take to train an inexperienced man so that he will become trained?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If he knows how to shoot and has the right training from the right kind of an officer, and, what is more important, has the right kind of companions alongside of him whom he can imitate, a recruit can go into the Regular Army and learn to be a fairly trained soldier in about three months; but if a bunch of men go in together who do not any of them know how to do anything no officer can drill them in three months. Is there any other question?

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman want to train the American youth to go across the ocean to fight across the water?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No, sir.

Mr. DIES. Or does he want to train them to stay at home and defend their liberties?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to train them at present to defend our rights as neutrals. I see no reason for doing any-

Mr. DIES. To go across the water?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I see no reason now to do anything of the sort. There might be some reason under some circumstances, but those, I hope, will never arise.

Mr. DIES. I should like to ask the gentleman this further question: In view of our present international relations, with American commerce practically barred from the high seas, does the gentleman approve of the President's course? Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have not brought up any ques-Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have not brought up any question of that sort. I stand by my President wherever I can, and I have not discussed his action. The other day I gave some history of what the United States did in 1798. I refused then to answer questions as to my opinion, because I will not embarrass the Executive. The gentleman speaks of going across the water. We had to send troops across the water once into Mexico, and we might have to defend the Monroe doctrine in South America. There are cases which can be imagined in which America might have to do the like, but at present we are trying to defend our neutrality and maintain the peace, if necessary, by force. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Quin].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope that no one will interrupt me or ask me to yield, because I have such a short time and I do not want to appear to be discourteous. Gentlemen, your committee has brought out a bill carrying an aggregate of $247,000,000 for Army national defense. Although the country may not know what it is all for, every man in this House ought to be familiar with the fact that it is for the defense of this country and not for war. It is true that we are building up the nucleus of an army upon and around which an army for war can be built if necessary. This bill does not meet with the approval of the great jingoes, but it ought to meet with the approval of every just and patriotic man who has the proper regard for both defense of his country and the taxpayers. [Ap-

We have provided a good bill. Of course we could not go to the last farthing desired by some of the General Staff and the Secretary of War. Your committee does not want to be put in an attitude that they are insipid or have no regard for the taxpayers by spending and wasting all that anybody may come before the committee and ask for. Therefore we have exercised good common horse sense, after due deliberation from the early part of December until the bill was reported to the House, and every item is just and can be well explained. Aside from the standing army and the 175,000 active National Guardsmen, we have several hundred thousand trained annually in schools and colleges and about 60,000 in the Federal training campa

The House has appropriated for fortifications over $62,000,000. The House appropriated for the Navy $368,000,000, and, with this bill, amounting in all to $707,000,000 for defense. Who wants more? Can the man who has any regard for the taxpayers desire more? Your Navy, gentlemen, has been well cared for. I will put into my speech what Congress has appropriated for the Navy from 1883 down to and including this year:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The appropriations under the "Increase of the Navy" recommended are necessary to carry out the construction of the vessels anthorized to be begun in the last naval appropriation act and those authorized to be begun in this bill and can not be reduced. These appropriations in addition to carrying the funds necessary for the entire construction of the ships for the next fiscal year, provide for the ammunition necessary for the various ships.

Appropriation for 1917, $368,000,000.

We have carried into the bills everything that a sensible and practical people in times of peace could expect, but gentlemen, we have in our country some propaganda that is endeavoring to inflame the minds of the American people and make them think that Congress is doing nothing to protect the Nation. I will put into the RECORD what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] said, touching the propaganda of this country.

Callaway] said, touching the propaganda of this country.

Mr. Callaway. Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent, I insert in the Record at this point a statement showing the newspaper combination, which explains their activity in this war matter, just discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moone]:

"In March, 1915, the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press of the United States.

"These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began, by an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers. The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy, national and international. of these papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

"This contract is in existence at the present time, and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy, and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

"This policy also included the suppression of everything in oppo-sibility and probability of the United States being acceptable.

(oes, "This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March, 1915. They have resorted to anything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant and wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is 'patriotism.' They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people."

Is there any man who doubts the influence that is operating on the great daily press of this Republic? The honest newspapers are doubtless affected by the interest-controlled portion of the great dailies in certain centers, and this coined sentiment is in a measure unconsciously reflected by many of them. So the baneful influences reach out and ramify through every State in this Union for the purpose of misleading and warping public opinion. They have not only stirred the people, but right here, while we are on the verge of breaking with a foreign country, you have the bloodthirsty press of this country endeavoring to inflame the public mind. You find some men in high authority endeavoring to do that. They are endeavoring to force America to fight on foreign soil under the joint banner of a King and Czar. They are mad at the President and Congress because our country is at peace. I am sorry to say that the papers carry the news that two distinguished ministers, followers of the lowly Nazarene, are attempting to inflame the public mind, and when attacked on the floor of the House justify their position by endeavoring to make the Son of the Lord, the Savior of the world, appear as a great giant with fire and sword, teaching the doctrine of rapine, murder, and bloodshed instead of peace, good will, and the salvation of mankind. I have never heard that doctrine preached before, and I am sorry to hear Not only that, but some great power is endeavoring to make the American people believe that we are an enervated and effeminate people. An ex-officer of the Navy made a speech the other night in New York, in which he stated that the American people are offeningly and the research can people are effeminate, and the reason he gave was that they wear silk stockings, ride in automobiles, and wear kid gloves. If that distinguished ex-naval officer would look around, go out of the little circle he travels in, he would find that the great majority of the people of this country are strong and vigorous. [Applause.] Just because he sees some few Charlie boys in a few cities who wear corsets and a monocle he thinks everybody is effeminate; because he sees some rich and degenerate fellow in that class he thinks all the people who are rich are effeminate. I wish he would go out in the byways and hedges of this country. Even in the great cities he would find that the great financiers and business men work 18 hours a day, are strong, virile men, ready to fight for their country. He would find in the city of Washington 90 per cent of the men in every walk of life strong, vigorous, and virile. [Applause.]

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. QUIN. I can not yield. He would find all over the Republic 95 per cent of the men are strong, virile, and vigorous. If he would go to the great sawmills, the great mines, or to the railroads, the shops and factories and oil fields, he would see workmen who are strong and virile; and if he would go on the farms he would see 98 per cent of these patriotic men with calloused hands and many with Army and Navy patches on their breeches, strong, active, brave, and patriotic, ready to defend their country at all times. Would he call all of these wealth producers—laborers, business men, and professional men—effeminate? His indictment of the American people is false, and I here denounce it. [Applause.]

But aside from that we have others of his class endeavoring to bring on compulsory military service for the people of this country. The bill has already been introduced and brought country. The bill has already been introduced and brought out by the Senate committee to that effect. I have it in my hand, and, in my judgment, it is subversive of the liberties of the people. You had better begin to gird on your armor to fight this propaganda.

My friends, this measure has in it all of the provisions and instrumentalities of tyranny. It has in it more than that. It has in it the teeth of a dragon to bite into frazzles the liberties of the people. [Applause.] It is honeycombed with deceptive snares. It is artfully touched with demagogy. It is a mon-strosity in times of peace. It is worthy of the Dark Ages. It is a mon-Gentlemen, will you stand for it? Will you stand for that kind of a measure, that would put all of the powers of a despot in the hands of the President? [Cries of "No!"] Never in the Dark Ages was there a tyrant who had the unbridled power for oppression that is unstintingly given in this bill for compulsory military training, and if put through the Congress would put into the hands of the President of your Nation the power to conscript every man between 19 and 28 years of age into the Army. We have heard that when the three wise men reported that Jesus was born into the world old King Herod sent out a proclamation that every newborn babe be killed. This bill, if adopted, will give the President power to send out a proclamation in the United States to be posted in the post offices and at the consular offices by which every man of the 9,000,000 men between the ages of 19 and 28 years shall go up and register and go into the service to be compulsorily trained, and that he shall be in the Reserve Corps of the Army, subject to the call of the President, for nine years. Not only that, my friends, but they put upon the proposition the power vested in the President to say what all of the regulations shall be. It puts upon the President the power to say that these men shall go upon the high seas or that they shall serve in the Regular Army of the United States. Negroes and whites alike would be drilled side by side and, of course, put on equality while in training and in the Army. This measure is absolutely subversive of all of the best ideals and traditions of our Republic. You have in the great papers that are sending forth this propaganda, in the controlling military men of our Nation, all of the forces coupled with wealth and aristocracy to trample on the rights of the people of the Nation. [Applause.] Not only that, but the exceptions in the bill show the handiwork of a wily and artful dodger. They propose to leave out the people who belong to certain sects and religions who do not believe in fighting, and I guess a great to leave out every man who has dependent upon him a wife or a father or a child. They propose to train criminals and men of bad character all in one unit. I guess that would be called the regiment of bad men from Bitter Creek.

Then they propose to establish a court, and this measure has in it a provision to give all of the powers of court-martial to an autocrat, to an Army officer, and, in the event these people would not go and register, it is proposed they be fined $1,000 and 12 months in jail. If this court-martial tribunal did not give justice, the district Federal court would be appealed to. My God! What chance would a poor man have? Not only that, but every man between 19 and 28 years of age who had not served in the Army or who did not have a certificate of exemption would be forced out of employment, because the man that would employ him would be subject to the same offense, to be tried by the same court, with the same penalty. Not only that, but the men who would be conscripted for this military training or service would be put into an army called the reserve army corps, to serve there from the age of 19 until he was 28. After being trained six months the first year, he would have to report one certain place at a stated day every year thereafter. He would be subjected to call by the President at any time till he is 28. I have figured that the expense of it would be at least $1,000,000,000 a year. You would have fastened as heavy expenses on this Nation a lot of retired Army officers in 30 years that would be much larger than the whole standing Army of your country Every one of these conscripted citizens of the United States under the bill would have a pension under the same conditions as the veterans of the Spanish War. Do you believe the American people would tolerate such things as that in time of peace? [Cries of "No!" "No!"] These people who are proposing that propaganda expect Congressmen to sit down and die of dry rot and do nothing to prevent it. Is it possible that the American people are, during these times of peace, to be swept off their feet by the militarists and propagandists that would allow in this hysteria a law to become effective that would deprive them of their liberties and that would be destructive of the traditions and the foundation stones of their Government? [Applause and cries of "No!"] It goes to the very founda-tion stone and the root of all of the liberties of our people, and if the American people have such a law as that put on them, the party that is responsible for it would be driven out of power. and the individual Congressmen who are sponsors for it would undoubtedly be scourged from their seats of office. [Applause.] But still we have from one end of this Republic to the other this poison gradually being trickled down from one point to another into every strata of society. It is an influence that is working more iniquity, it is an influence that is doing more harm and overriding more of the rights of the people than all of the corporate influences that have ever yet been exerted in the legislative halls of the Nation, and yet we find no newspaper in the city of Washington or in the city of New York that writes a single line against this propaganda. You find it urged by every sinister influence of the Nation. I shall fight it to the last ditch. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Olney].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for only 15 minutes of the time of the House because I believe that a new Member generally should be seen and not heard, though I would like to have about half an hour; but considering that I have only 15 minutes I will ask that I be not interrupted. We agreed as a committee to suggest or make no radical changes from the defense act passed June 3, 1916, and I desire to commend the able and efficient manner in which the chairman of our committee conducted his exposition of the bill. [Applause.] Should the National Guard fall down or weaken in its system, and I hope it will not and that it can meet the conditions of the act passed by this House June 3, 1916, I would suggest another system, and that is universal military training; and I want my district and the State of Massachusetts and the Nation to know that I am in favor of universal training and service as the most democratic system of military establishment. If you were to poll our committee you would find about one-third of it in favor of such a system, and about the same number of men in favor of the summer military training camps, and on our committee there are three colonels—I call them-members of the National Guard, who, too, I believe, are in favor of universal military training, and I shall call them also battle-scarred heroes of the Spanish-American War; and if by chance there should be up in the Press Gallery there the editor or a representative of the Chicago Tribune, I ask him not to misquote my words as such words were misquoted at one time in the introduction of a speaker in the North at a great gathering. This gentleman introduced a colonel of the great gathering. This gentieman introduced a colone of the Civil War as a battle-scarred hero of the Civil War. The next morning the newspaper account appeared as "bottle-scarred hero" of the Civil War [laughter], and the colonel went to the newspaper editor and said, "You must retract." The editor said, "I will do so." The colonel said, "It means your life or mine if you do not." The next morning the editor did attempt to retract, but instead of it appearing as "battle-scarred hero" it was "battle-scared hero" of the Civil War. [Laughter.] In answer to a question of mine submitted to Gen. Scott he admitted that by the adoption of a system of universal military training we could materially reduce the Regular Army. An hour or so ago, coming out through a question which a Member asked as to what each soldier cost the German Government, I believe the figure is about $240 per man, while our Army, including overhead charges, costs about $1,000 per man. Therefore, if in the end we raise our various increments of the Regular Army it will cost our Government about $200,000,000 to maintain its Regular Army.

The Argentine Republic has a regular army of only 5,000 men. They adopted some years ago a system of universal military training. Switzerland has but a small force. I believe this country could get along with a Regular Army of only 50,000 men and this Government might save $150,000,000. If the National Guard should fail, and I do not want it to fail, I want it to meet the conditions, but the evidence comes to me in com-munications and letters that this system will fall down and when the terms of enlistment expire they will not enlist again. Let us then adopt the system of universal military training. I am flying in the face of the protests of the labor unions of my district, who have protested to me against the adoption of such a system, but I believe I am strong enough in my district to tell them wherein I believe that they are wrong. Why should my boy not serve his country as well as the boy of my next-door neighbor? [Applause.]

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. I want more time and I can not get it. I will say my colleague from Tennessee, who made a splendid and able speech, referred to the system of universal training now in vogue in Switzerland. He mentioned 65 days as being required to train Infantry and 48 days the National Guard, but he should have stated 48 nights, and it is only one hour a night a week, or 48 hours during

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. OLNEY. No; thank you; I can not yield.
Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, this is so important everybody ought to hear it, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.
The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DRISCOLL). The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.
Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman can not be taken off his feet by the gentleman from Texas in this way.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. DIES. The point of no quorum, I understand, can be made at any time.

Mr. DENT. But the gentleman can not take the gentleman off his feet.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield, if that is

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I submit when the point of order was raised by the gentleman from Texas that the gentleman speaking did not yield the floor at all and the gentleman from Texas, therefore, could not make the point of order of no quorum present.

Mr. OLNEY. Sixty-five days of intensive training in the Republic of Switzerland would probably be 600 or 700 hours year as compared with the 48— The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair finds 125 gentlemen present, a quorum.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has counted and ascertained there are 125 Members present, a quorum, and the gentleman from Massachusetts having the floor will proceed in order.

[Applause.]
Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, the system of military training has been in vogue in Switzerland since the thirteenth century and it is perhaps one of the most peaceful nations on earth. With a population of approximately 3,500,000 people, an area twice the size of Massachusetts, it can mobilize an army of 240,000 troops within three days, and in 11 days a reserve army of 250,000. The Swiss Army within the past 20 years has captured 17 international trophies in rifle contests, one of which was held at Camp Perry, Ohio. At one time at a notable celebration 30,000 Swiss Guards were reviewed before the Emperor of Germany. He said to a Swiss officer, "Supposing 60,000 Germans would attack your force of 30,000?" The Swiss officer very quickly said, "They would just have to shoot twice, that is all," showing how confident was the Swiss nation of the marksmanship of its troops. I have referred to the intensive drilling of 65 days in infantry and 75 days for artillery, and 90 days for cavalry, but you must also realize that the Swiss youth starts to train when he is 12 years of age in calisthenics and athletic exercises in his school. That is why perhaps I am so enthusiastic for the establishment and propagation of Government training camps which were started in 1913 with an enlistment of only 222 men at Plattsburg, N. Y.

In 1914 these camps had approximately 660 men; in 1916, about 3,000. The camps are now under Federal supervision, and they are very successful, and there are sectional camps in various places in the Nation, and last year they trained—and the camps are ostensibly for training officers—about 16,000 men, who were enlisted in these camps last year, and it is expected that this year they will train at least 40,000 men. The reason I am in favor of universal military service is that I have heard so much of class distinction and class prejudice that I believe the adoption of such a system will burn away all the barriers forever of class prejudice and class distinction. As it is now, if you take our Regular Army or the National Guard, who are the men serving our country? Invariably they are the sons of poor men and they are the brothers of those who toil. I want the rich and the poor to serve alike, side by side, in times of peace as well as in times of war. [Applause.] Should the National Guard fail in its system, and the National Guardsmen themselves acknowledge the possibility of failure, we will therein save the Government something like $50,000,000 a year should we abolish this system. We want no war, gentlemen of the House, but we want to be prepared. Nearly all nations have some form of compulsory military training and service. A member of the English Parliament at my house within a month told me that America would probably never adopt the system until a crisis came. I hope sincerely that the crisis will never come.

May I quote to you from such men and eminent authorities, first, as Thomas Jefferson, who said:

I think the truth must now be obvious that we can not be defended but by making every citizen a soldier.

And the venerable prince of the Roman Catholic Church, Cardinal Gibbons, who says:

I was greatly pleased to see the bill introduced recently by the Senator from Oregon providing for this training. Such a system would be of immeasurable benefit to the young men of the country in every way. It would safeguard the Nation. It would not foster militarism. It would not be a provocation to war, but would make us strong enough to insure peace as far as humanly possible.

And from Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor:

We must have a preparation that means a comprehensive development of all the powers and resources of all our citizens. In Switzerland every man is a soldier—not necessarily to go to war—but he has the physical and manual training necessary to defend himself, his family, and his country. Under that system the Swiss have developed a manhood, a character, that challenges the admiration of the world. We will be satisfied with nothing less in America.

Gentlemen of the committee, we have a great Regular Army. From my experiences at the summer military training camp at Plattsburg last summer, where I spent three days as the guest of the commander of the Department of the East, I was enabled to witness the democracy of such an institution, where the clerk from my own town, my own district, served side by side with the rich banker and broker and lawyer of New York. It innoculates in the youth the spirit of democracy which this Nation needs. It is the best way to brush aside class distinction. Therefore I favor enthusiastically the adoption of such a policy.

I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an editorial from the Washington Post on the Plattsburg idea.

Our bill has provided an appropriation of $2,500,000, reduced from $3,281,000, providing for the transportation and subsistence of these men who are loyal and patriotic enough to take 30 days off in the summer time for their periodical encampment. And you must realize that they have five such different sectional camps in this country, the largest being at Plattsburg, where, during the encampment which I witnessed, there were 6,000 men enrolled. And they are there trained, under our bill, by the best available United States officers. Therefore as an opening wedge to universal military training, and I say uni- own State in the recent mobilization. Pennsylvania stood only versal military service, too, because perhaps these systems will go hand in hand, the institution of the summer military training has been invaluable.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I object to the extension by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire the Chair to put the request or to withdraw the request?

Mr. OLNEY. I make the request as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe I am entitled to such an extension of remarks by including certain papers. Is there objection?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Saunders). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I propose when the bill H. R. 20783 is reached in the reading under the five-minute rule to offer an amendment, and in order that the House may understand what the amendment is, it being long, I ask for the extension of my remarks by the printing of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DIES. I object, Mr. Chairman. Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Morin].

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, to-day there are a great many questions before the American people which have to be solved. There was never a time since the birth of this Nation when greater problems, involving the life, prosperity, and destiny of our Republic, were before us. These questions have to be solved on the basis of sound principles and policies and under the wise and able leadership of eminent statesmen. To my mind, the most vital question is that of the preservation of our liberties, those liberties which our Constitution guarantees to every man who lives upon these sacred shores-the inalienable right to live his life, think his thoughts, love his country, and worship his God according to the dictates of his own science—those liberties which were so eloquently expressed by that patriot Patrick Henry, when he said, "Is life so dear and peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery?" From that day to this liberty has become the priceless jewel of American citizenship. Our forefathers sacrificed their love of family and home for it; they suffered and they died to make it an eternal principle; and we, their children, who renew the obligations it imposes, should enjoy it but never abuse it. That liberty which we inherited from our fathers we are in sacred duty bound to preserve and hand down unimpaired to the safe-keeping of future generations. And how can we best preserve this liberty, Mr. Speaker? Why, by being adequately prepared to strike and crush at the first blow any foreign foe that would attempt to invade our peaceful shores.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill as reported to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs will pass in order to make pos sible the Standing Army authorized in the public-defense bill which was passed at the first session of this Congress. great and only regret is that the public-defense bill does not authorize a standing army of 250,000, as was proposed at that time by my colleague on the Military Affairs Committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

I favor an Army sufficient to repel invasion; large enough to protect the interests of this country against the world. An Army actuated by the high ideals that we are for peace and against war unless it is to defend, protect, and preserve those liberties for which this Republic stands.

I believe we should have a Navy large enough, great enough, and strong enough to protect us from the aggressions of any and every nation that does not respect American property, the American flag, and, above all, American lives. It matters not how great or powerful a nation may be, it must do no wrong or injustice to an American citizen wherever he may be, so long as in the exercise of his legal rights. The people of our country know their rights and they dare to maintain them at all times; and the sooner the nations of the world become alive to this fact, the quicker and more certain it is that there will be no war or wars. I yield to no man in my love for country, its prestige and welfare, and I wish for peace, but it must be a peace in which the safety of our citizenship is assured and our national honor is maintained. I am for peace with honor. Expense is not a factor, but safety and self-respect is necessary.

I have always been a supporter of the National Guard, and it is a source of gratification to me the showing made by my second on the list of States that sent troops to the border, and she sent 15,000 fine, stalwart lads to take their places in the ranks. These boys gave up so much. Home ties were broken, loved ones in many instances were left to face distress and pov-They laid on the altar of their country hopes and ambitions, business opportunities, chances that may never come again, but the call of danger came and all was forgotten. Duty's demand was upon them, and they gave instant obedience.

Much criticism was leveled at the National Guard during their mobilization, and it has been declared by the press and those high in authority that the guard has proven to be an ineffectual branch of the Army. Viewed from a fair and reasonable standpoint, the National Guard acquitted itself most creditably in the mobilization; but the President's call had scarcely been issued before inspired statements were being published alleging the complete failure of the militia system under "the iniquitous Hay bill." The inconsistency of attempting to show failure of the operation of a law which was not in effect and under which the War Department had taken up no detail of administration should have suggested itself to every thinking mind; but in this, as in many other things, the opinions of others, who are considered to know, was accepted without question.

First. That on the day of the call there were approximately 134,000 men in the National Guard; that only about threefourths of the organizations composing that force were embraced in the call, and yet the guard went into the Federal service 160,000 strong. This was accomplished within the measure of a few days. The rush of men to the colors was checked by the Federal authorities, who ordered the discontinuance of the system of recruiting for war which had been pre-scribed and in effect in the National Guard and in the operation of which the latter had been schooled since 1911. Even with this handicap the guard was increased over 30 per cent in strength within a few days, and before the recruiting was stopped and placed in the hands of Federal agencies.

Second. Another luminous feature of the mobilization was the absolute and deplorable failure of the supply departments of the Army to meet the situation and their inability to function effectively and efficiently. All War Department agencies were suddenly thrown into a complete state of chaos, and confusion reigned supreme. It is astounding that the men responsible for this condition should now have the effrontery to say to the country that the National Guard was ill equipped.

When the call was made by the President for the National Guard organizations to proceed at once to their respective mobilization camps, they went; but in thousands of cases militiamen were obliged to sleep on the ground and were without arms and necessary clothing for weeks. But this was not due to the failure of the National Guard as an organization, but it was due to those in charge of the affairs of the Army and to our utter lack of foresight and preparation. This is a matter that is now justly engrossing the attention of all. Profiting by our own sad experiences and the lessons that can be learned from the conflict across the seas, we should set ourselves to the task of working out this great problem of military and naval preparedness.

Recently I received a statement from Brig. Gen. Albert J. Logan, commanding the Second Pennsylvania Brigade. Gen. Logan, I take pleasure in saying, is a constituent of mine. He is a man who stands high in business circles, one who has had years of experience in affairs pertaining to the militia, and was in command of the Second Brigade when it was at the border. Being a close student of national preparedness, when he speaks it is as one who is thoroughly conversant with the subject, and his opinion on such matters receives consideration, for it is a recognized fact that he is an efficient and capable officer. In this statement is proposed a plan, which I think is very logical, for the organiation of our national defense. I will give a few excerpts from this statement:

excerpts from this statement:

Manifestly we can not embark in this most important enterprise—the most critical adventure in which this country has ever embarked—unless we know wnat we are doing. Before we build a building, we must be certain of our foundation. Our foundational trouble is our Army organization. Whether it is due to bureau rule or what not, I state no opinion, but the fact remains that a general staff that is subject to continual changes, a new chief of staff every four years, and a war college that changes every now and then, with no definite fixed deterquations of policy and procedure, can not produce a military system worth having. The first thing we must do, therefore, is to make the organization of the directing element stable and permanent, so that a policy, when once determined, shall be wisely and logically prosecuted.

How shall we decide what course to pursue? What plan shall we Prosecuted.

How shall we decide what course to pursue? What plan shall we adopt? Every organization has its own solution; Army officers, magazine writers, and many others have written tomes and tomes of solutions. And if we adopt any one of them who shall be responsible for failure? This is a national question, and it means a mobilization of the patriotism and the resources and the capacity and the brains of this country.

Officers of the Army, no matter how capable or experienced they may be, are not able to formulate such a policy as will properly provide for the mobilization of the elements necessary for the Nation's defense or the training of its civilian population. This involves the social, economic, and political elements of our population. The strategic and tactical features and the actual training may well be left to soldiers, but the solution of the problem itself is much greater than its single military feature.

Manifestly no military legislation that is worth while can be produced at the present short session of Congress. Let a commission be appointed by the President of the United States, to consist of officers of the Army of the United States of experience and judgment, of Members of both houses of Congress, representatives of the Organized Militia of the United States, and a sufficient number of civilians adequately to represent the social and industrial life of the country. Let this commission during the year 1917 pursue an exhaustive investigation into every phase of our military and defense problems. Let it make a comprehensive report to Congress in December, 1917, which will make recommendations for specific legislation. We have tariff commissions and currency commissions and commissions to investigate and control everything imaginable except the one subject which is most important to our national life and which we know least.

which is most important to our national file ast.

The recommendation of a commission of brave, patriotic, unselfish men of character will command the respect and confidence of the country and their recommendations will have the support of the people. It is a time for investigation and consideration. We can not do anything without the support of the country. We are not entitled to the support of the country unless the program which is presented is the calm, cool result of the judgment of men who have given it their careful, unremitting, unselfish study and attention and whose capacity and patriotic impulses and purposes can not be questioned.

Specker I am a Republican and believe in the prin-

Mr. Speaker, I am a Republican and believe in the principles laid down by the Republican Party, but there are times when party consideration should be forgotten and patriotism alone should have our thought. Such a time is now. I believe we should be intensely loyal and self-sacrificing under the present trying conditions, irrespective of party affiliation and racial We should stand unitedly in the support of the President of the United States when a question of right is involved; for after all we are first for our country, its ideals and victories, then for our party on all great public questions which tend to promote the prosperity of our land and bring happiness and contentment to its people.

In conclusion, let me say there have been three great figures in American history which have stood out before the people as great stars in the firmament. The first was Columbus, undeterred by the contumely of those lacking his ken, confronted by the hostility of the Old World's circumscribed belief, and yet having faith in what is now common knowledge he braved the terrors of an untried sea in order to demonstrate his theory. Through forsaking the shores of the Old World he was able to find the new. Then came Washington, whose life was one long and glorious struggle for what he considered to be vital factors of right. Taking his stand when it required the greatest of moral courage, through firm adherence to principle he was able to establish a Government whose proudest boast is that he was the "father." The last of the three was Lincoln. Standwas the "father." The last of the three was Lincoln. Standing with unyielding firmness when the country was being rocked by the storm of strife and dissention within, undismayed by the disloyalty of those he wished to aid, serenely secure until the Nation that seemed to be rent and divided through turmoil within was again united, all then were ready to proclaim him as the one who through fidelity to principle had been able to save us from ruin and final oblivion. Our President is facing troubles equally as grave. We as a people are upholding his hands. If he succeeds in keeping this country from being embroiled in this fearful conflict which is now devestating Europe—which I pray he may—there will come a time in the rope—which I pray he may—there will come a time in the future when party prejudices are stilled and partisan passions have died away that he who records the deeds of men and nations will add another star to that constellation, and then the names will be: Columbus, the discoverer; Washington, the creator; Lincoln, the savior; and Wilson, the preserver.

Mr. KAHN. How much time has the gentleman used, Mr.

Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute. He yields back four minutes. Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I was in the House on day before yesterday, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Garden] asked unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. I did not object at that time, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] had addressed the House formerly on that same subject. I did not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania addressing the House for 20 minutes after the gentleman from Massachusetts had obtained that consent, because I believed it was justice and fairness to both of those gentlemen. But I desire to say here and now that I am firmly convinced that any discussion in this House of the causes that lead to the European war or any discussion in this House of the causes that led to our unfortunate break with Germany or what should be our future course in this German controversy is more apt to provoke war than prevent it. [Applause.]

I have come to the conclusion, after listening to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] and the gentleman from Masachusetts [Mr. Gardner], that such exhibitions can do nothing but stir up in the minds of American citizens a feeling of hatred toward either one or the other of the belligerents, and thus bring about the thing least desired by all Americans, and that is war.

In this hour the people of this country who most desire peace should permit the President to handle our diplomatic relations, trusting in him and believing as I do and as most of the people of this country believe that he desires peace, and in the end will obtain peace.

Last fall I, in conjunction with many other Members of this House, condemned the President for his peaceful attitude to-ward Mexico, and called him even a coward and too proud to

The Mexican situation last fall was much worse than our present relations with Germany now are, and yet the President kept us out of war with Mexico.

I believe the President stands for peace, if peace can be had with honor. I believe the President is doing all he can to keep this country at peace with the world, and the only effect such exhibitions as we had in this House Thursday can have is to hamper the President in his lawful right as the Chief Executive of this Nation.

When the President desires the opinion of Congress he will come, as he always has in the past, and lay the facts before Congress. Then will be the proper time for this House to discuss this subject. But for the present it is improper for Members of this House to discuss in a partisan way, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] did on Thursday of this week.

Believing, as I do, that such discussions are a menace to the peace of this Nation, I for one, if no one else does, will object to granting permission to Members of this House to discuss our present diplomatic break with Germany, believing that any such discussion will do more to provoke war with Germany than prevent it.

We should all restrain our feelings in this matter, to the end that by so doing we may aid the President in bringing about peace.

So far as I am concerned, I shall object to any Member of this House, if I am here—and I am here most of the timeaddressing this House upon this subject.

Now, what is a patriot? Here is a little article in a paper that I am going to read about what a patriot is. I read:

THE GOOD PATRIOT.

At this particular time, with the tragic conditions existing in our international relations, the good patriot is not the one who goes around shooting off his mouth about what he would do if he were President. In fact, he is not a patriot at all, but is a public menace and should be hit over the head with a 6-foot water-elm club. The good patriot is the man who keeps his mouth shut, attends to his own business, and stands ready to get out and do his share in case our country should unfortunately be actually drawn into war with Germany and her allies. The worst nuisance of all is the man who is always trying to pick an argument or a quarrel with his neighbor of German birth or descent; we will not attempt to prescribe proper treatment for him. The great bulk of these so-called German-Americans will be found supporting and fighting for the land of their adoption against the land of their birth if such a choice should ever become necessary.

That is a good definition of what a good patriot is. I deplore the fact that Members of this House should attempt at this time to discuss our relations, unfortunate as they may be, situated as we are at this particular time. I believe that the President of the United States will do all that he can, and he will go further than many of us would to preserve peace not only with Germany but with every nation in the world. All that we can do is to sit here quietly and attend to our business, and when he calls upon us to express our views then there will be plenty of time,

Let us stand by the President in this crisis now, and you will find you will do more to bring about peace than if you are constantly talking about it on the floor of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIES. Is a point of no quorum in order during the progress of a speech?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the question, although the matter is not pending before the committee. In the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, when a quorum is not present no business can be transacted. Therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, if the point of no quorum is made when a gentleman is addressing the committee it is the duty of the Chair to ascertain whether a quorum is present. When the Chair has ascertained the fact if a quorum is present, then the gentleman who is entitled to the floor can not be taken off until his time has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Helgesen].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, the crisis confronting the country, caused largely by the campaign waged by a controlled press and by those who desire war for the profit it holds, has created a situation, even in Congress, which is most dangerous to the welfare of the Nation.

There is an element here composed of those who, it seems, will go to any length to bring this Government to intervene in the European war without giving any consideration to the people who will be forced to bear the burdens of such a conflict.

Believing that the people of this Nation have the right to be consulted and to determine for themselves whether or not they want to become a party to the wholesale slaughter now going on in Europe and offer their sons as a sacrifice to the modern barbarous and inhuman engines of destruction used by both sides in that conflict, I am introducing the following resolution:

barbarous and inhuman engines of destruction used by both sides in that conflict, I am introducing the following resolution: House joint resolution ordering a referendum of the question of whether or not we shall declare war.

Whereas the United States has been insidiously dragged toward entanglement in the European war; and Whereas through various propagandic agitations a war sentiment is being artificially engendered in this country; and Whereas the horrors of war have never been more fitly described than in the immortal words of the late illustrious Gen. Sherman, who said that "war is hell"; and Whereas a declaration of war by the United States will bring untold sorrow and misery into hundreds of thousands of American homes, and hundreds of thousands of American wives and mothers will see their sons and husbands torn from them to die in the trenches; and Whereas the question as to whom belongs the right to decide our foreign policies, and whether war shall be declared or shall not be declared is lost sight of; and Whereas we have but one authority with power to declare war, namely, the authority granted by the Constitution, only to the Congress of these United States; and Whereas the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of these United States recognize the inherent, inalienable right of the people of the United States to instruct their Government to do the will of the people: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Congress order a referendum of the question as to whether or not we shall declare war to the people of the United States to instruct their Government to do the will of the people in case of threatened invasion), so that the will of the people on this vital question may be made known to the Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That (except in case of threatened invasion) the President shall take no action that may tend to involve the United States in war until the result of said referendum shall be made known to the Congress.

If the element which insists that war is the only way by Congress.

If the element which insists that war is the only way by which we can honorably settle our differences with the belligerents in Europe finally succeeds in involving us in that terrible conflict, no father, no mother, and no American boy who will be sacrificed in the trenches in Europe will ever be able to truthfully say that I have not done my utmost to save them from such a fate, or that I have not tried to give the people of the Nation an opportunity to determine for themselves whether or not they believe that war is the only honorable means by which we can deal with the situation now confronting us. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used four minutes.
Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

[Mr. DIES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KAHN. How much time has the gentleman used? The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Crisp). The gentleman used six min-

Mr. KAHN. He yields back four minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman yields back his remaining four minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I desire to use those four minutes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] very properly has pointed out to this committee the gravity of the situation that confronts the American people. Some of us, with wider vision than the gentleman, foresaw some years ago that some day, possibly, such an emergency might arise, and patriotically we have stood upon this floor and demanded of the Congress that our country be prepared to defend American rights and American citizens all over the world. [Applause.] The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] at this late hour, when we confront a crisis, now says that he is ready to stand by the President. I and those like me who believe in preparedness have always been ready to stand by the President of the United States in any crisis that might confront the American people, but we wanted to be prepared properly and effectively to defend the rights of this country. The time has arrived, I hope, when the gentleman from Texas and others like him begin to realize what it means for a great nation like ours, with all the interests that we have, to be unprepared Mr. DENT. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an amendment that I propose to offer, when we reach page 75, line 4, providing for compulsory universal training.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want to preface what I have to say by this statement: I am in favor of this bill and shall support it. I am not in favor of universal militarism or compulsory military service. If the time comes I shall tell the House why I am opposed to it. God has blessed Mrs. Ricketts and myself with three boys, and I do not want to sacrifice them on the altar of war if that can be avoided. I think the people of America have gone war mad and preparedness mad to a great extent, although I have supported all the preparedness measures that have come before the House with one or two exceptions.

I do not mean to say to you that I am not in favor of defending American rights and this Government or that I am opposed to having one of my sons shoulder his gun and strap on his uniform in the service of his country. That is not what I mean to say. If that time should come, I am willing, so far as myself and my sons are concerned, to do our full share in that regard. I believe America should be protected and American rights should be preserved and protected, but I think before we enter into a war we ought to have something about which to go to war. I fear, my friends, that we are making a great mistake by not inculcating in the minds of our children a greater knowledge of diplomacy, and diplomatic relations between the nations of the world. I think the time will come, although I do not expect to see it in my time, when there will be no such thing as war between nations. It may startle you when I make this statement, but nevertheless I believe it to be true, and time will prove the wisdom of this statement.

I think the nations of the earth have learned the lesson that very little, if anything, can be accomplished by war. I want to say that I honestly and candidly believe that if it had not been for the fact that Germany and the other nations across the sea now involved in that great struggle had not been so amply prepared for war they never would have had such a war as is being waged over there. I am going to support this measure because the time is ripe when we ought to consider the affairs of the Nation brought on by the estrangement between our own Nation and others across the sea. That is all I want to say about that matter.

Mr. Chairman, I want now to talk about another matter that is very important and has not been discussed on the floor of the House, except once by the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. Sherwood. That is the question of old-age pensions. I have in my district something like six to ten thousand men who labor for a living. In our State we have a workmen's compensation law, and the corporations running the coal mines are required, under that law, to contribute to the insurance fund of the State. As soon as the law became effective the corporations in my State saw fit in the mines to subject every man beyond 50 years of age to a physical examination by a physician employed by the company before he can be taken back into the service as a miner. Many men who have worked in the mines all their lives, at the age of 50 to 60 because of this rule of the company are deprived of the employment in which they have been engaged during the greater part of their lives, and in this way are thrown out of employment entirely, with no chance of going into any other vocation. This is not only true in my State but in many States of the Union, and I only refer to this particular class of people because old-age pensions would apply to all people of the country and make no difference to what employment they worked at.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes; but I have but a short time.

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman made any estimate as to what this will cost?

Mr. RICKETTS. No; I have not made an estimate of what it will cost, but I have made an investigation of what has been done by other nations in the world with reference to this important matter.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Is it not a fact that we have a law of this character in Ohio?

Mr. RICKETTS. We have no old-age pension law in the State of Ohio, but we have what is known as a mothers' pension

Mr. EMERSON. That is what I had in mind.
Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the time has come in the industrial history of this Nation when something must be done by this Government toward the sup-port, comfort, and protection of the worn-out workers of Amer-

Every nation on the globe has made provision for old-age pensions with the exception of the United States and Russia, so it is certain that this question is one with which this Government must deal sooner or later. It is not a new question, It has been agitated throughout the world as far back as 1884. But, you say, this Government can not afford at this time to make provision for its aged and worn-out workers. What, then, is to become of them? This Government is certainly not so cold and indifferent toward the men and women of the country who have given all of the best part of their lives to the development of the country as to allow them to go unprotected.

Mr. Chairman, I have given this subject of old-age pensions a very wide and careful consideration, and I am intensely interested in it, and feel it my duty to call the attention of this House to this most important problem. If it is possible to inaugurate a system of old-age pensions, the poorhouses, almshouses, and those institutions caring for the poor would be needed no longer. Only those special institutions would be required which care for the insane, dipsomaniacs, and those whose physical condition is such that it is not advisable for them to live at home or in private families.

The aim of every normal man and woman is an old age, free from care and want. To that end most of them toil patiently and live closely, seeking to save something against the day when they can earn no more. And yet the same fate awaits the overwhelming mass of them.

In the life of the toller there are weeks, and sometimes months of enforced idleness; weeks of unavoidable illness; losses from cheating and swindling; and then, as old age creeps on from about his fiftieth year, a constantly declining capacity to earn, until at the age of 55 or 60 years he finds himself helpless and destitute. There is hardly a more pitiful tragedy than the lot of the toiler who has struggled all his life to gain a competence and who, at 60 years, faces the poorhouse. slave had no such tragedy as this. It is a tragedy reserved for the free worker in the freest Nation on the globe.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted that my colleague would not recommend any system that is not based on reasonable frugality of the beneficiary in the days when he is

Mr. RICKETTS. Of course not.
Mr. FESS. I would not vote for any measure that would allow any individual to waste his substance and say the Government would take care of him anyway when he gets old.

Mr. RICKETTS. I agree with the gentleman. I have not espoused any such theory as that.

I think it must be apparent to all who weigh the facts relating to the condition of the 20,000,000 wage earners of the United States that one of the greatest economic problems confronting the Nation is that of old-age dependency.

The proper solution of this problem requires economic skill of the highest grade and legislative courage and ability of the most patriotic kind. With probably three-fourths of all adult males and nine-tenths of all adult females in our great industrial army of 20,000,000 of human beings receiving in wages barely enough to provide food, shelter, and clothing of the poorest sort, and with scarcely 1 wage earner in 10 able to lay by in savings for the rainy day of invalidity or old age, and with the almshouses and benevolent homes crowded with the cast-off, indigent, aged, and worn-out members of our industrial army, and with community and private charity already taxed beyond reason for temporary relief of the poverty stricken; with the efforts at relief through industrial corporations and mutual societies making only partial, inadequate, and ofttimes unstable provision for a very small proportion of the needy; with the States recognizing the demands of only a few of the wage earners; and with the evidences of growing discontent over present conditions; and with fear and dread of the future and the high cost of living that now prevails throughout the Nation, the problem or question of old-age pensions is one of more serious proportions and of greater magnitude than one at first thought would conclude and makes the solution of this question extremely difficult, yet, nevertheless, important and essential to the welfare of our own esteemed and beloved aged citizens.

It is the same problem in the presence of which the statesmanship of Europe has been standing with uncovered, bowed head during the past half century, that demanded the greatest constructive legislative ability of a Bismarck, the foresight of a Gladstone, the most serious thought and considerate attention of British Parliaments, under the leadership of a Morley, a Chamberlain, an Asquith, and a Lloyd-George; a problem which has forced itself into government councils and legislative assemblies, with demands for immediate solution in Belgium, France, Austria, Denmark, Switzerland, and Italy, as well as Germany and Great Britain, in Europe, and has received the most courteous attention and careful treatment in New Zealand and Australia. The attempts at the solution of this problem abroad may be interesting to those who realize its importance here, but I have not the time, nor can I take the space in the Congressional Record to set forth copies of the various pension laws adopted in the above foreign countries. Germany led in this movement, however, and the law enacted in that country in 1889 has been largely a model and inspiration for other countries.

Among the European nations France is the latest to adopt an Among the European nations France is the latest to adopt an old-age pension law for all working people above a certain age. This law was passed April 5, 1910, and became effective July 1, 1911, and applies to all people of both sexes who receive wages less than 3,000 francs ($600) per year employed in any branch of industry, commerce, liberal professions, agriculture, servants for wages, mining, seamen, and so forth.

From the above facts of old-age pensions having been established in other countries there may be drawn suggestions and lished in other countries there may be drawn suggestions and plans that will be of material aid to the economist and legislator in the solution of the problem in this country. The schemes now established abroad comprise practically all those yet devised for the protection of old-age dependency among the working people.

"What will the United States do with reference to this important matter?" "What scheme will she choose?" These are the questions which the people of the United States must sooner or later meet in legislative action and determine.

Fortunately or unfortunately, we Americans have not that conception of the family as the unit of society and that reverence for old age which is ingrafted upon the hearts of the people in many foreign countries. Why should this condition exist in the United States? In our manufacturing centers especially the helpless destitute father, mother, grandfather, or grandmother is regarded as a distinct burden to the household, the carrying of which ofttimes forces the children out of school and into the streets, factories, or shops, in order to provide for the sustenance and maintenance of the parents or grandparents and supply the household expenses.

Many a man loses heart and goes through the years of his life from 50 onward with drooping head and faltering step, because there is only helpless want as the goal of old age. This ought not to be in an enlightened and civilized country.

I take it to be clear that from an impartial study of this problem in all its phases the conclusion is inevitable that this country must provide a system of service pensions for its old and worn-out citizens.

Approximately 1,500,000 people of the 103,000,000 population of the United States above 65 years of age are dependent upon public or private charity to the amount of $250,000,000 annually. Thus far 1 person in 18 of our wage earners reaches the age of 65 years in penury, and the indications are that the proportion of indications are that the proportion of indigent old is increasing. There are no signs of abatement in the causes of this deplorable condition.

Strange as it may seem, the United States, with the exception of Russia, is the only great industrial nation in the civilized world that has not already attempted a practical and permanent solution of this problem of old-age dependency. Oh, you say, it can not be done. It will be entirely too expensive to this Nation to undertake such an enormous task as caring for the indigent old of this country.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the House, this is not a new question. This question has been agitated by all the nations abroad, and a solution has been reached that is entirely satisfactory, not only to those who are protected by the solution of this problem, but to the Government as well.

This is a progressive age, and new questions are arising daily-questions that never before confronted the people of this Nation-and we, as a people, must meet these new questions face to face. Many States, labor organizations, fraternal benefit societies, industrial establishments, transportation companies, steam railway companies, electric line companies, steamship companies, and other associations of capital have already, in a mild way, made provisions for the old aged or dependents of their respective classes or organizations; but as yet no nationwide provision has been made by this Government. many States have provided pensions for the retired teachers. Municipalities have provided pensions for their retired police and fire forces and other employees. This Government has provided pensions for its soldiers, their widows and orphans. only so, but it has provided, by legislation, a national workmen's compensation law, which is limited to Government employees. Several of the States have adopted the workmen's compensation law, which is for the purpose of protecting those who are injured while engaged in the line of duty. Not a few States have already provided mothers' pensions. The different religious conferences have provided for the superannuated ministers, and the teachers of the country have organized themselves for the purpose of petitioning legislation which will take care of the old, worn-out teachers in all the States of this Union.

I regret to say that a great many men and women of the shops, mines, and farms who have toiled incessantly, in order to produce the wealth of the country, and who have greatly assisted in making this the richest Nation in the world, are treated with cold and total indifference after their working days are over. Yet it is the boast of the American statesmen that this is the greatest Republic on earth. That this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. With this latter statement I agree, but let us make it so in fact and not in name only.

Under the workmen's compensation laws now in vogue in many of the States in which mining is the principal industry the great corporations in opposition to the law have weeded out of their ranks and their employment men 50 years of age and upward. They have been turned out to starve, notwithstanding the fact that they have given their whole lives to this particular employment, and are disqualified in their old days to take up any other vocational pursuit with any degree of effi-ciency. What is to become of them? They have rendered invaluable service to the country in promoting its welfare in this particular industrial enterprise. As one Member of this House I am in favor of such action on the part of this Government and this Congress as will protect and provide for these deserving American citizens. And this is only one of many classes of workingmen who occupy identically the same position and who are entitled to the protection of this Nation. How should they be protected? In a half-hearted, cold, indifferent way or in a way commensurate with their just deserts, as true, honest, upright, and patriotic citizens?

I love this country and its institutions. I am proud of its form of government. I esteem and admire its citizenship and all that this Nation possesses that makes it the greatest of great nations. I love its flag, the emblem of freedom and protection; and as a Member of this House I implore you, in the name of this great Nation and for the sake of humanity and humanitarian equity, to give this subject your most profound, sincere, and honest consideration.

Why should this Nation be the last to provide for its indigent aged? Why not America first in matters as vitally important as this?

In the last 30 years this Nation has squandered millions and millions of dollars through its Congress under the pretense of conserving some of its institutions, resources, and commercial waterways; yet no step has been taken to protect and provide for the old men and women of our own beloved country. Why are we so benighted to this most important duty? Let us stop now and consider what should be done in the premises.

Over in the Congressional Library there can be found a full and complete digest of this all-important subject, prepared severally by the countries abroad which have adopted legislation on this subject. Then, why should we send a commission abroad to gather information for us on this subject when we have all the information available in the Congressional Library where each and every Member of this House may read and learn for himself just what foreign countries have done in relation to oldage pensions.

For weeks past I have been investigating this subject in the Library, and I know whereof I speak when I say that all the information needed in order to enact proper legislation in this matter is within our reach.

Now, I am not going to recommend any particular method by which the old-age dependents of this country may be pensioned. Different countries have adopted different methods and different kinds of legislation, and I leave the question of what class of legislation should be enacted to the membership of this House, However, I sincerely hope that the membership of this House will give this subject that degree of consideration and investigation which it so justly deserves.

After having fully investigated this matter, I am driven to the conclusion that it is not necessary, as proposed by some Members of this body, to spend a fabulous sum of money to have a commission investigate this subject, although at first I favored it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill be allowed to revise and extend their remarks for five legislative days, and also all gentlemen who may hereafter speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unani-mous consent that all gentlemen who speak upon this bill may have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have that done, but would we in Committee of the Whole have any such power?

The CHAIRMAN. As a rule, no. Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not objecting.

Mr. TILSON. I am not objecting. Mr. DENT. I understand that nobody makes the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Gordon].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the committee solely for the purpose of calling attention to some testimony which I inserted in the Congressional Record yesterday, which will be found on page 3800 of the RECORD. This testimony consists of evidence that was taken before the Committee on Military Affairs, and a letter from Mr. Alifas, who represents, believe, in this city as a legislative agent some labor organizations, and the reply to that letter from Gen. William Crozier. I believe that those two letters and this testimony afford ample opportunity to examine both sides of the question to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. In framing this bill in our committee a provision which was inserted by the House in the bill last year was included, which prohibits the use of time study and premium payments in the United States arsenals. The committee by a roll-call vote struck out that provision, but by inadvertence it was left in the bill, but I understand that both those who favor the prohibition and those who oppose it have agreed that it will be eliminated, and there will undoubtedly be made upon the floor of the House in the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule a motion to insert an amendment prohibiting the use of time study and premium an amendment promitting the use of this study and payments. I therefore request the Members of the House to examine this testimony, because it is one of the most important questions involved in the bill. This testimony discloses that upon the installation of time study in the Watertown Arsenal the cost of production to the Government was reduced two and seven-tenths times. The appropriation bill last year became a law in August, I believe, and that contained a provision prohibiting the use of the time study and the premium payments which had obtained in the arsenal for several years. As soon as the bill was signed by the President, of course, the system was abandoned in obedience to the law. This testimony discloses that upon the abandonment of that system the cost of production in the arsenal increased two and two-tenths times. whether you want war or not, and regardless of whether we have war or not, it does seem to me that with these undisputed facts staring us in the face we are guilty of criminal extravagance if we prohibit the use in Government arsenals of a system which has demonstrated that it will result in such a tremendous saving to the people of the United States in the manufacture of arms and munitions of war.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HULL of Iowa.

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What does the gentleman mean by saying that the cost was increased two and two-tenths times? Does he mean that an article that would cost $1 ordinarily would cost $2.20?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. GORDON. Yes; I mean that. That is exactly what this evidence shows. Gen. Crozier, in his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced in evidence, and it will be found in the hearings of that committee, a table showing the exact cost to the Government of producing these articles before and after this system was abolished. In some instances the cost was multiplied by four, in some instances it was less than double, but the average throughout the arsenal as shown by this table increases that cost two and two-tenths times. not a matter of guess or conjecture; it is a matter of absolute, mathematical demonstration. This is a very important matter to the Government because it involves wasting enormous sums of money in the manufacture of arms and munitions of war provided for the Army, the Navy, and the fortifications, amounting in the aggregate to hundreds of millions of dollars. But it is important to the people of the United States for another reason, and that is this war in Europe has created a most remarkable situation in the United States. You can all remember and recall that within recent years the system of manufacturing in the United States has undergone a revolution. Plants have been enormously enlarged; the work of manufacturing has been subdivided. Now, this system of time study and premium payments is a very simply system. So far as it is applied by the Government itself it simply involves the keeping of a record of the time expended by any man, or any number of men, in producing any kind of article or any constituent part of that article, so that when you are through you not only know what your article costs but you know what every single part of it

There are in the United States business failures every year ranging from 15,000 to 20,000. I undertake to say that a very great proportion of the business failures in the United States are due to the fact that they have not provided themselves with a proper accounting system. They do not know what it costs them to produce an article and every part of that article, and for that reason they in some instances sell articles for less than it costs to produce them. I do not know of any method under the sun by which any firm that does any considerable business can keep an account of the cost of producing an article that amounts to anything without resorting to some system, like the Taylor system, by which they can determine the cost of producing the article and each and every part of that article.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to assert that the manufacturing institutions that do not have the Taylor system know nothing about the cost of the articles that they manu-

Mr. GORDON. No; I did not say that. Now, the small manufacturers might keep an account by simply counting the number of things produced, and if they only have a few men, they can do it by dividing the total cost in a day by the number of men, but I undertake to say a firm which employs hundreds and thousands of men, such as does the United States in its arsenals, can not possibly conduct its business successfully unless it has some means of determining what is the cost not only of producing an article ready for the market but every part of that article, and you can not possibly know what is the cost of producing these different parts of the article unless you keep a record of the time consumed and know what time is expended and what you have to pay for producing that part of the article.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to say there is no large manufacturing institution without the use of the Taylor system which knows anything about what it costs?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no; I did not say that, but I say that unless the firm confines itself to piecework there is no intelligent way of determining it without the use of this system or some system analogous to it. Now, this system is being intro-duced in manufacturing establishments generally throughout the country

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What is the proportion of the large manufacturing industries in this country to-day that are using this

Mr. GORDON. Oh, I do not know. I think they all ought to be using it, because I do not believe there is any way—
Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is fairly well acquainted up in Cleveland?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Do they use it up there?

Mr. GORDON. No; not all of them. I know that some of the most successful manufacturers there use it, and I also know that the firms that use the Taylor system pay the highest wages not only in Cleveland but anywhere in the United States, and they are the most successful manufacturers in the United States. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the committees of the House having to do with military affairs and naval affairs are composed of patriotic Members, who try earnestly and honestly to do their duty. Last year we passed the national-defense act. was approved June 3, 1916, and the many Army officers to whom I have spoken proclaim it with one voice to be the best piece of Army legislation that has ever been written into substantive law. The Congress is often blamed for dereliction of duty in connection with legislation for the Army and the Navy. It has been my experience, and I have been on the Committee on Military Affairs for 12 years, that whenever the War Department makes out a good case the committee invariably grants the request of the department. The members of the committee are laymen and have to depend for information and advice on the officers in the War Department in order that they may legislate intelligently and for the best interests of the country.

For some years there had been a feeling in the committee that there was too much favoritism in the War Department. So three or four years ago Congress passed a law which has met with universal favor among the officers of the Military Establishment. The so-called Manchu law, which requires every Army officer to be with his own organization at least two years out of six, has worked a great good in the Army. And I do not propose with my vote to allow any change to be made in that splendid piece of legislation. Occasionally there may be an isolated case wherein that law works a hardship. But the benefits are so many that I do not believe it ought to be changed in any particular.

We found, too, that occasionally favored officers were being promoted over the heads of brother officers. For instance, men who had been serving in the lower grades of the Army were made brigadier generals. You have no idea of the demoralization an act of that kind brings in its train. The earnest, able, and efficient officers of the line of the Army who do not have a chance to spend much time here in Washington, who continue their arduous work at distant and isolated stations or posts, have a right to expect that in the fullness of time they will be promoted to a higher grade. And, as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois said yesterday, it is the aim of every colonel of the line to be made a brigadier general. The national-defense act contains a provision which is known as section 4 of that act. It reads:

General officers of the line: Officers commissioned to and holding in the Army the office of a general officer shall hereafter be known as general officers of the line; officers commissioned to and holding in the Army an office other than that of a general officer, but to which the rank of a general officer is attached; shall be known as a general officer of the staff. The number of general officers of the line now authorized by law is hereby increased by 4 major generals and 19 brigadler generals: Provided, That hereafter in time of peace major generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of brigadler general of the line and brigadier generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of colonel of the line of the Regular Army.

That was intended to prevent an officer occupying a position in one of the bureaus here in Washington from being promoted over the heads of men who were out in the field with the fighting force of the Army of the United States. This provision of the law was approved on June 3, 1916, and yet six months thereafter the very spirit of the law was violated by the present officials of this administration.

I have nothing to say in derogation of the officer who was recently promoted to the grade of brigadier general of the line. He probably is a very splendid officer. I do not question his ability, but he never served with the fighting force of the Army at any time in his life. He was our military attaché in Berlin up to a few months ago. He is an engineer officer. He was recalled from Berlin recently, and on January 3, 1917, Col. Joseph E. Kuhn was assigned to the First Regiment of Engineers. They were serving down on the Mexican border. On January 5, two days thereafter, before he had joined his regiment, he was nominated to the position of brigadier general of the line, vice Gen. Evans, who had been a brigadier general in the Infantry branch of the service. On January 9 the colonel joined his regiment on the border, four days after he had been nominated to this position. On January 15 he was confirmed as a brigadier general of the line by the Senate. On January 16, the day after his confirmation, he was relieved from duty on the border and ordered to report to the Chief of Staff at Washington, D. C., for duty. On January 19, 1917, he was commissioned a brigadier general of the line. He left the border on January 23, reported in Washington on January 26, and was assigned as president of the Army War College on February 1. Section 11 of the national-defense law—
Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?
Mr. KAHN. When I conclude this statement.

Section 11 of the national-defense act contains this provision: The enlisted force of the Corps of Engineers and the officers serving therewith shall constitute a part of the line of the Army.

The officer serving therewith shall constitute a part of the line of the Army, it says, but this officer did not serve with Engineer troops at all before he was nominated for the position of brigadier general of the line. And this whole transaction took place during the month of January last. It savors strongly of favoritism.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN

Mr. SLOAN. I was desirous of knowing the name of this man whose meteoric career you have described.

Mr. KAHN. I mentioned it before. It is Gen. Joseph E. Kuhn, the head of the War College, and no doubt a very excellent officer. I do not question his ability, but I question the propriety of making appointments in that manner in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the provisions of the national-defense act. [Applause.] I do not say nor pretend to assert that this administration is alone guilty of such things. It also has been done by Republican administrations. But I do not care whom it is done by; it is unwarranted and most reprehensible, and it tends to demoralize the Army of the United States. [Applause.] It is a practice that I hope will be discontinued from this time on.

Mr. TILSON. Will my colleague yield right there?
Mr. KAHN. Yes; certainly.
Mr. TILSON. What effect would such a transaction as that have upon the mileage appropriation of the Army, which has been a much-mooted question?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, it would deplete it in no time. In order to give this gentleman a position within the strict letter of the law, not the spirit of it, it was necessary to send him down to the border and bring him right home again after he had gone down there. It furnished him with a round trip to Texas out of the appropriation for "transportation of the Army."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. As a general thing, that plan is reprehensible. But does the gentleman think there are absolutely no exceptions where special fitness ought to be recognized in pro-

Mr. KAHN. Well, under peculiar circumstances; yes. But not in times of peace, when men are performing the ordinary duties that devolve upon them.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it true that this particular officer has been a military observer abroad, and might possibly-I can not say probably-have special fitness at this time to serve in the

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman did have service abroad. He was an observer in this war, and I believe he was also an observer in the war between Russia and Japan. But I do not consider that that especially fits him to be made an officer of the line, a general officer of the line, in charge of fighting

Mr. BORLAND. Might it not fit him to be useful in the War College?

Mr. KAHN. I think that they could have promoted any one of the dozens of colonels of the line in the Army who could have done the work in the War College just as creditably.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Would it be necessary to make him a brigadier general in order to make him president of the War

Mr. KAHN. I rather think that the head of the War College has always been a general officer. Whether there is any provision of law that requires that I do not know, but I think that heretofore it has been the custom to appoint a general officer of the line to that place.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the question of merit is involved in this case perhaps a parallel might be found in a recent remarkable jump in the naval service, in the Medical Corps of the naval service, where we might almost consider that merit is not the determining factor. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Well, when officers of the Army or of the Navy are promoted because of personal service to some one high in authority you will have a disorganized and dissatisfied Army and a disorganized and dissatisfied Navy. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] on yesterday stated what he found on the border. I, too, visited the border while on my way to Washington toward the end of last November. I consulted many members of the National Guard, officers and enlisted men, and I want to say that there was not a single officer or man of those I consulted who did not tell me that he believed in universal military training and service, and they seemed to have reached their conclusion in this way: They said, "We were patriotic enough to enlist in the National Guard. When the call came we answered it. We went to the Texas border with our organizations. We are here now on the border. We have been compelled to endure many hardships. We do not complain of that. But men equally fit and capable of bearing their share of the public burden, yet not as patriotic as we were, remained at home. They are enjoying the comforts of life. They are being paid good salaries. Probably some of them have secured our jobs, because many of us will have to go back to seek new positions. Our old jobs are gone. We do not think it fair in these United States that such an undemocratic condition should be allowed to prevail. We are willing to do our 'bit' for the country which we love, but we think that every other able-bodied man in the United States should be compelled, when the occasion arises, to likewise do his 'bit,' just as we are doing ours now." [Applause.]

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. You mean, when you say that, compulsory military training? You used the word "compelled" there.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. That is what they said. I am quoting

Mr. GARLAND. That means compulsory military training?

Mr. KAHN. It means that. Mr. GARLAND. I understood there was an attempt to make distinction between "compulsory" and "universal" service.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I want to ask this question for information, because I have confidence in the gentleman: Since this debate has gone on, and for several years, I have heard discussions on the subject of military training. I do not know; but how long does it take to train a soldier until he is a seasoned soldier, ready and prepared under almost any ordinary conditions to go forward in a battle?

Mr. KAHN. It depends upon what branch of the service a soldier is in.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the gentleman go into that. Mr. KAHN. I think an infantryman can be trained adequately to go to the front and defend his country, if need be, in a year's time. That is why I have always defended a shortterm enlistment, because I feel that what this country needs, not only now, but at all times, is a trained reserve army; and I feel that when a man has had a year's training in the Infantry he ought to be allowed to go back to the body of the citizenship and engage in private employment. I know that the training he secured while in the Army of the United States will be of incalculable benefit to him as a citizen and as a man. [Ap-

Mr. COX. Now, will the gentleman yield for another ques-tion? Does it take longer to train a soldier in the Artillery than it does in the Infantry?

Yes; it will take probably six months longer. Mr. KAHN.

Mr. COX. How about training a cavalryman?

Mr. KAHN. It takes a little longer than it does to train an infantryman-about the same length of time that it takes to train a man in the Artillery.

Mr. COX: About 18 months?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the higher officers of the Army disagree a good deal about the length of time, some of them maintaining that six months are sufficient to make a seasoned soldier?

Mr. KAHN. I think they have all changed their minds since the European war. At first England began to send its volunteers to France and Belgium after having trained them six months in England: but she soon found out that that was not enough training under present conditions. The trench warfare has caused them all to change their views, and England now requires a full year's training before she undertakes to send her men into the trenches.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.
Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that Gen. Wood is almost alone in his opinion that six months of intensive training—which is very different from ordinary training—is sufficient?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I think he is. The consensus of opinion among Army officers, as I gauge that opinion-and I have spoken with many of the officers on the subject-is that in the Infantry you require a full year's training. The conditions over in Europe in this war have changed the opinions of the Army officers of this country in many particulars. For instance, take the Chief of Ordnance. He had been making shrapnel shells in the proportion of 3 to 1 of the high-power explosive shells. The portion of 3 to 1 of the high-power explosive shells. The European armies are using high-power explosive shells much more extensively. Gen. Crozier of the Ordnance Department of the War Department, who for many years felt that the highpower explosive shells were not so important, stated before our committee that he has come to the conclusion that we need a great many more of the high-power explosive shells and fewer of the other kind than he had formerly thought necessary.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.
Mr. SANFORD. What has the gentleman to say with reference to whether the training prescribed for the National Guard can in any sense be considered an equivalent for the one-year minimum of training the gentleman has just men-

Mr. KAHN. I frankly confess that I do not think it can be compared with it at all; but I want to say this about the National Guard: For many years there have been two opinions in this country as to the ability of the National Guard to act as first-line troops. That question will never be decided until it is decided right. I, for one, have held in the committee, and I hold on this floor, that we ought to do everything at this time to give the National Guard every proper chance to make good. If you do less than that, you will have this question recurring all the time. The present law will give an opportunity to demonstrate their worth as troops, and I want to see them given every possible chance.

Mr. HAYES. I wanted to ask the gentleman if his statement as to one year's minimum training is intended by him to apply to our present volunteer enlisting system, or whether he desires to have it understood that that would be the case if we had compulsory training?

Mr. KAHN. I feel satisfied that anything less than one year's training would be a mistake. Those who advocate universal training may be willing to accept a provision for a six months' period of training in order to make it more popular, but I believe that in the end it will be found that a year's training is absolutely necessary. [Applause,]

Mr. Chairman, within the last 20 years this country has undergone a material change. Up to that time we were not considered, outside of the United States at any rate, a world power. Then came the Spanish-American War, which brought in its train many new and difficult questions for the American statesmen to solve. For the first time in our history we had insular possessions far distant from the seat of government. The people who inhabited those islands were different in race, in education, and in their traditions from the people of the United States. At that time an overwhelming majority of our countrymen gloried in the fact that we were to take upon our-selves a part of the "white man's burden." We provided civil government for the Philippine Islands on a more liberal scale than any of the great powers had ever given a colony. Under those laws the inhabitants of the Philippines have prospered and flourished in a measure far beyond what their leaders had ever dreamed of. In recent times, however, a sentiment has been growing up in this country against their retention. Many of our statesmen think that the time has come when we ought scuttle" and leave the islands to their fate. Others would establish a protectorate over them. Others, again, would have them neutralized under some treaty which might be agreed to by all the world's great nations. We have learned in recent years that treaties do not amount to much when nations become embroiled in war. Therefore I do not think the American people will ever consent to their neutralization. For myself, I feel that we should hold them permanently. They have already in one instance demonstrated that they are of real value to the Republic. When our minister was held a prisoner in his com-pound in Peking during the Boxer troubles we did not have to appeal to England or France or Germany or Russia or any other great nation to give him protection. We had troops in the Philippines, and once in our history we were able to protect the life and property of an American official in a foreign land without an appeal to any foreign country to protect him for us. But not only did we acquire possession of the Philippines, Porto Rico, Guam, and Hawaii, but we have established protectorates over Cuba, Panama, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and Nicaragua. The establishment of these protectorates carries with it new problems, new burdens, and new responsibilities. I have always opposed the proposition that the United States of America has become the world's policeman. We ought to keep out of all entangling alliances with foreign powers. We ought our-selves to be able to protect American lives and American rights everywhere. And in order to protect American lives and American rights and American property in every portion of the globe we will have to increase materially the effectiveness of our Army and our Navy.

The experience of the present war has shown that there is only one system in a democracy like ours that will be effective for the adequate defense of the country. That system is universal military training. Universal training would be of great benefit to the growing youth of the land. It would inspire the young men with respect for law and order. It would teach them the necessity of obeying the commands of constituted authority. It would teach them how to work en masse. It would teach them how to keep cool in moments of stress or excitement. It would teach them how to keep cool in moments of stress or excitement. citement. It would teach them how to take care of themselves physically. It would teach them sanitation. It would teach them many things that would be invaluable to them in whatever walk of life they might choose to follow; and above all, it would compel every man to do something in the service of his country. Unfortunately American citizens are growing up in the belief that their country owes them many privileges and the belief that their country owes them many privileges and prerogatives. They do not realize fully that the citizen owes his country duty and service. Why, even in the large cities many so-called patriotic, broad-minded Americans constantly try to escape doing mere jury duty. They think nothing of that. They think they are smart if they are able to induce the court to let them avoid it. It is a wrong principle. Every man owes duty and service to his country. When that is fully understood, and when that is fully carried out, this Republic, which we all love so dearly, will have a far better and far more patriotic and far nobler citizenship than it has ever had in all the days of our history. in all the days of our history.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read the following communication from the Conference of American Patriotic Societies:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 7, 1917.

Washington, D. C., February 7, 1917.

Hon. Julius Kahn,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Ma. Kahn: It becomes my duty as secretary of the Conference of American Patriotic Societies, consisting of 25 patriotic and national-defense societies, with a membership of over 500,000 representative citizens of the United States—men and women resident in every State of the Union—to present the accompanying resolution to the House of Representatives, through you.

This resolution was presented to the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate January 18, 1917. The committee, appointed by the chairman of the conference for this purpose, delivered this resolution to the Senate committee, and each member urged that the Congress give serious consideration to this resolution.

As the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States is not now conducting hearings, we can not present this resolution to your committee in person, and therefore I have been instructed to request you to read this resolution from the floor of the House of Representatives and urge you, with all due courtesy, to ask that the same be given the serious consideration of that body.

We believe the temper of our citizens is such at this moment that the legislation recommended will meet with their hearty approval and united support.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. HAYES. Does not the gentleman think-I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. KAHN. My time has been exhausted.
Mr. FESS. Can we not have the time extended five minutes on the question of compulsory military training?

Mr. KAHN. I hope to take that up when the bill is under discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TILSON. When we reach the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] it will be in order.

Mr. DENT. The balance of the time I have promised to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Fields]. If he is willing to yield-

Mr. FESS. Just for a question?

Mr. FIELDS. I yield one-half minute.

Mr. FESS. The question I would like to have the House answer is how you are going to reach compulsory military service or universal training with a half a million teachers of the United States prejudiced against it, and with most of the mothers of the country prejudiced against it. I was in a convention of a national teachers' association less than a year ago when an attack was made upon it, and the attack was cheered to the echo, and when somebody spoke in favor of it he was hissed. What are you going to do, and how are you going to get these boys?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The way to do it is to educate the people.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Fields].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 274 minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope, as it is getting late and as those who still remain have been very patient throughout the day, that I may not use all the time allotted to me, because I believe in the policy that the Speaker announced at the beginning of this Congress, that this Congress ought to be a working Congress and not a talking I shall therefore try as best I can to bring myself Congress. within that rule.

I want to say, first, in regard to the bill that the committee has given very careful consideration to each and every provision of it, and while we have recommended material reductions in some of the items, we have in each instance carefully endeavored to guard against any reduction that would impair the efficiency of the military establishment, and with the under-standing that if it should develop that some, or any, of the reductions are too great that we would favor increasing them to the necessary amount before the bill is ultimately enacted into law. I believe that every man on the committee and in the House, if he will sound himself carefully, wants this country I believe that every man on the committee and in the properly prepared to defend itself against an emergency. I do properly prepared to detend itself against an emergency. I do not mean by that that I am a military enthusiast, for I am not. When I was first placed upon the Military Committee I felt that I was very much misplaced, because of my lack of enthusiasm in military affairs. I regret that it is necessary to maintain an Army. I regret that it is necessary to call men from the productive pursuits of life to make up the personnel of the Army. I regret that it is necessary to expend millions of money for the maintenance of the Army. But my likes or dislikes in the matter are one thing and my duty to my country is another, and while I am not an enthusiast about the Military Establishment for the sake of having one, I am an enthusiast about my country, its safety, its liberties, and its rights. [Applause.]
As a matter of duty and to meet a cold, stern responsibility

I join the committee in an effort to prepare this country with an adequate Army. Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman may not be enthusiastic about a police force, but he thinks it is a necessity, does he not?

Mr. FIELDS. An absolute necessity. I regret that my town has to maintain a police force, but it does, and so does the National Government. I may say here, Mr. Chairman, that I hope and pray the time may come-and while it may not come in my time or the time of my children, I trust that the time may come-when all nations throughout the earth will, in the natural evolution of government, rise to that high plane of civilization on which it will not be necessary to maintain organizations for war or implements of war. [Applause.] But that condition is not now before us. That day has not arrived; that period of international development is not yet in sight, or if it is it is remotely so; and so long as humanity throughout the earth is infected with the spirit of avarice, greed, and animosity, as we find it to-day, all nations that propose to maintain their rights and their integrity must provide an adequate defense, regardless of whether they like to do so or not.

Now I want to talk a few moments about the cost of the Military Establishment. There are pacifists throughout the country who are attempting to inflame the public mind against preparedness because of the cost. If I have estimated it correctly, the national defense, both Army and Navy, this year will cost in the aggregate $700,000,000. That is a very large sum. Nobody disputes it; but we are preparing to defend a very large Nation and a very wealthy Nation, a Nation of 100,-000,000 people besides our insular population and of $200,000, 000,000 of wealth besides our insular possessions, with an annual average increase of 93 per cent. So let us see what pernual average increase of 93 per cent. centage of the national wealth the national defense is costing. Seven hundred million dollars amounts to about one-third of 1 per cent of the national wealth, saying nothing of its rapid increase, to which I have referred. Therefore when we figure the wealth of the Nation, together with the fact that we are the most extravagant Nation on earth, when we consider the fact that the average annual cost of the American family is $17.44 for legal amusements, which amounts to approximately $400,-000,000 annually; and, further, consider the fact that $250,000, 000 are spent annually for automobiles for pleasure riding alone, saying nothing of the countless other expenditures which are unnecessarily made by the American people, which run into billions of dollars, I think, Mr. Chairman, that we can well afford to reconcile ourselves to a cost of one-third of 1 per cent of the national wealth for the national defense, without which the prosperity and perpetuity of the Nation is insecure.

So much for the cost. A good deal has been said about the fundamental principles of our military system, and I want to refer to that, too; but before doing so I want to talk a little about the practical business side of the system. I want to look at it from a business man's point of view, and in doing so I am not personally criticizing, or at least I am not impugning, the motives of the men under whose management our system is and has been conducted. They probably do the best that they know from their viewpoint, but they are men, most of them, who have gone through West Point or some other college at an who have gone through west route or some other conege at an early age, before they had any practical business experience, and went from there into the Army, and have ever since been in a military atmosphere, surrounded by military environment, and have grown up in the belief that the reckless expenditure of money is a matter of little concern so long as it is furnished by the National Government. They are men who have never had any connection with the practical business propositions and problems of the country of a private nature, where economy must necessarily be taught and observed, and because of their lack of such training they do not in many instances apply proper methods of economy through which millions of dollars of the public funds could be saved. If, however, they make mistakes from a business point of view in the management of the affairs intrusted to them we can afford to criticize ourselves as well as them for our failure to make some amendments to the system. I think that one of the reforms most needed is to bring the committees of Congress that have to do with the Military Establishment into closer personal touch and contact with that establishment. We must assume the responsibility of making recommendations to our respective houses in legislative and financial matters pertaining to the Military Establishment. It is, therefore, necessary that we possess as thorough knowledge as is possible of the establishment. We sit in our committee rooms and hear testimony from men many of whom, as I have said, have never had any practical experience. They come to us and tell us what they need and from the testimony we arrive at a conclusion. I maintain that the committees of the House and Senate who must assume the responsibility of making the recom-mendations for the appropriations should personally acquaint themselves with the Military Establishment just as far as it is possible for them to do so. I believe that the members of the committees of the two respective bodies should repeatedly visit every Army post in the United States so far as it is possible for them to do so, and every other place for the support of which we are called upon to appropriate money. By doing that we would gain a personal knowledge of the conditions that exist, and when they come before us and make representations we could handle the matter more intelligently, and we might, I may say, make improvements upon the part of Congress as well as upon the Military Establishment by such procedure.

It is true that that would cost some money, it would cost the travel and hotel expenses of the members of the two committees while making these trips, and probably this additional expense would meet with some opposition on the floor of the House and in the other body, but be that as it may, it would be one of the most profitable investments that the Congress could possibly make. Then there is another thought that I have had in mind. There is nothing that makes a man get down to brass tacks in his business transactions like a knowledge of the fact that some other man with authority is scrutinizing his work. We appropriate millions of money for the maintenance of the Army. No private business institution on earth would appropriate the amount of money that we appropriate for the maintenance of the Army to finance some private enterprise and turn that sum over to men who are impractical, so far as the business side is concerned, to be their own judges and executioners. What would a private business concern do? It would have agents of some kind inspecting the work done, to see if it was properly done, and so I have a plan that I have in mind to which I have given a great deal of thought. I believe that it would result in a great improvement if Congress would provide for three accountants, one to be appointed upon the recommendation of the military Committee of the Senate, one to be appointed upon the recommendation of the Military Committee of the House, and one to be appointed by the President. I suggest that method of appointment for the reason that by that system this board would not become military in character, for it would realize that its existence depended upon the administration in power, which would cause it to strive to meet the wishes of the administration in the discharge of its duties. I would give that board of accountants authority to look into the expenditures of the War Department. Let the men making the various expenditures account to this board. Give the board power to make investigations of the market values of supplies consumed by the Army and make investigations of the value of buildings or other property purchased or leased for the use of the Army and the purchase or rental price paid for same, and many other duties which I can not here define, and report back to the Congress and the President on the first day of each session, with any suggestions that it might care to offer looking to the greater efficiency of the service or greater economy in the expenditures. I think that that would put the Army nearer onto a business basis, and when the Army officers realize that there is a board of accountants upon their track to scrutinize each expenditure and call them to account for same, or to make a report back to Congress giving their views upon the wisdom or unwisdom of the expenditures, every man who has to do with the expenditures will be more careful. That would cost some money, and yet I think it would be a most profitable investment.

I realize that this proposition will meet with opposition, and especially from Army officers, but that does not discourage me in my belief that it is right. There never was a reform inaugurated that did not meet some opposition from some quarter, regardless of how meritorious it may have been.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a good deal said about our military system and especially about the National Guard. Each of my colleagues on the committee, and many other Members of the House, know that I have never been wedded to the National Guard system, and I am frank to say that I have be-lieved, as my colleagues on the committee knew, from the be-ginning of the national-defense act of last year that the National Guard system, builded as it is upon the militia of the several States, is a failure. In making that statement, however, I distinguished between the men of the National Guard and the system under which those men must serve. I think that the men who make up the National Guard are as patriotic as any on earth. I have no quarrel with them. They have done the best they could under the system, but my objection is to the system. I do not believe that a military system under double control under 48 subordinate heads can ever be a success.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state what he means by the "system" not being satisfactory from his standpoint?

Mr. FIELDS. The National Guard is only under the Federal Government when called out for national purposes. Then when it is dimissed from Federal service it goes back under State management and control, and is not under Federal control again until called out again by the Federal Government for Federal purposes.

I believe whatever our system is upon which our country must depend for its defense, it should be at all times under the control of the Federal Government. But there is another feature of the system which is more objectionable than the one just referred to, which is the lax and ununiform method of conducting physical examinations of recruits of the National Guard by the different States. Some States may come well up to the standard adopted by the War Department for recruits of the Regular Army; others fall far short of it, as was shown by the Federal examinations of the National Guard called into the Federal service last year. Approximately 27 per cent of the National Guard was rejected upon physical examination in 1916 after it had reached Federal mobilization camps, as is shown by the testimony of Gen. Mann, on page 1184 of the hearings before the Military Committee. More than 50 per cent of the guard of the States of Georgia and Kentucky, and 77 per cent of one company of the First Regiment of the latter State were dismissed from the service because of physical disabilities.

Some of these men had been in the National Guard for several years and thought they were physically fit for Federal service. No man can contend that a system so uncertain is a safe one upon which to depend for the national defense. Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman be in favor of the Constitution being amended so as to put the militia under the direct control of the President at all times?

Mr. FIELDS. I agree with the gentleman that the militia of the several States can not be put under the absolute control of the Federal Government without first securing an amendment to the Federal Constitution, vesting in Congress the power to control same.

The vesting of such power in the Congress would deprive the States of their powers over their militia, which was wisely reserved by them in framing the Federal Constitution; and in view of that fact such an amendment should not be proposed, and, in my opinion, would be rejected by the States if submitted to them for ratification, for its adoption would make the States dependent upon the Federal Government for military protection against domestic insurrection or other internal strife too strong to be put down by civil authority. These functions should be performed by the States in their sovereign capacities without dependence upon the will or adherence to the dictates of the Federal Government. Such a relinquishment by the States would be extremely unwise, and is inconceivable.

The State militia was very wisely ordained to perform a double function, viz, to protect the State in its sovereign rights and to serve the United States when called upon to do so in executing the laws of the Union, suppressing insurrections, or repelling invasions. Its duties, therefore, are of both State and National character. Its mission is noble, and its officers and men are patriotic; its services to its State are indispensable, and it should not be taken from under the control which the State now exercises over it. But it can not, in my opinion, perform its double function under 48 different heads and add to the Military Establishment of the United States the strength necessary to make that establishment commensurate with the responsibilities which now confront it and which may materially increase in the future.

Aside from the present conditions, which it is not necessary to discuss but which are in many instances straining every fiber of our foreign relations, we have heavy and growing responsibilities which render necessary a greater preparation for national defense by reason of our obligations under the Monroe doctrine to our sister Republics of Central and South America, which have apparently increased within recent months. And without discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of our assuming these obligations as defined by different opinions, it is sufficient to say that so long as we as a Nation assume such obligations we must preserve our honor as a Nation by meeting the responsibilities which we thereby incur, and it is my opinion that to meet these responsibilities the Federal Government should be in absolute control of a trained force sufficient to meet any exigency which may arise.

The American people very wisely oppose a large standing army, and I do not believe they will permit the creation of such an institution in the future. It therefore becomes necessary, and I think properly so, for us to depend upon a trained national reserve as an adjunct to the Regular Army, over which the Federal Government has absolute control; and it is my opinion that this reserve should and can be organized, operated, and maintained in a way that will strengthen and invigorate the State militia by bringing its organizations of the several States under a more uniform system of training and into closer touch with the Regular Army. I would secure and maintain, in the discretion of the President, this national reserve by the creation of a volunteer force known as the Volunteer Army of the United States of not to exceed 150,000 men, to be enlisted for a term of three years, in increments not to exceed 50,000 men a year, which would bring the Army to its maximum strength in three I would give these recruits six months' intensive training with the colors, with pay while training as recruits in the Regular Army, and then return them to the body politic, to be held in reserve for the remainder of their enlistment, with the provision that they must attend and participate in not less than 12 days' drill each of the two remaining years with the National Guard at the post nearest to their respective places of residence, with salary, travel pay, and subsistence while thus going to, attending, and returning from such drills.

This would call the volunteers away from their homes for only one period of any consequence—that is, the six months with the colors immediately succeeding enlistment. The drills of not less than 12 days with the National Guard for the two remaining years could be done in a period of two weeks, including time of travel to and from home, which would only be a short vacation and a splendid recreation for those taking advantage of it.

The training and returning to the citizenry of 50,000 men each year distributed throughout the country would create renewed interest and enthusiasm in the national defense, and their association and services with the State militia during the remaining years of enlistment would, in my opinion, animate that organization to such an extent that its recruits would materially increase and be made more efficient for military service; and the knowledge which these reservists would continually carry back to and disseminate among the people as a whole would give them a more intimate knowledge of our Military Establishment and its operations which would serve as a step in elementary training.

Some men with whom I have discussed this plan contend that Congress has no power to require the National Guard-State militia-to drill at fixed periods each year with men of the reserve army, yet these same gentlemen contended when the national-defense act of 1916 was being framed and enacted into law that that measure would federalize the National Guard. But by this last contention they admit the fallacy of their former contentions, from which I dissented at the time the bill was framed and passed.

I am basing my plan for joint maneuvers between the forces of the reserve army and the State militia on the hope that the States would join the Federal Government in the inauguration of such a plan.

If, however, any State should refuse to so cooperate, the second and third year reservists could be drilled at the Army post nearest their respective places of residence; and as I shall explain later I favor a wide distribution of Army posts throughout the country.

There are many plans being discussed at this time, but I think the plan which I have outlined is more in harmony with American ideals than any other plan I have heard discussed or mentioned. The question of universal military training is being discussed throughout the country, and I want to say a word right now in regard to that, and this is a thought that every Member of Congress may well take home to himself and con-sider. It matters not whether we are for or against compulsory or, in the more mild term, universal military training or service, and without going into the merits or demerits of the system at this time suffice it to say we are here as the proxies of the people and we can not enact laws contrary to the will of the people with the expectation that those laws will be maintained. The country at this time is against universal military training, and if this Congress or the ensuing Congress should enact a law forcing upon the country universal military training or universal military service, the successors of the Members who voted for that law would repeal it in the next Congress and would probably reduce our appropriations and set the defense propaganda back perhaps a quarter of a century. And, gentle-men, these thoughts may well be considered. We are legislating for the American people. We have got to keep in harmony with the ideas of the people or somebody else will do their legislating for them, and properly so, for if ever the Representatives of the people in these Halls shall ignore and disregard the will of the people, then our Government will cease to be a representative government.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. KING.

Mr. FIELDS. I will.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that universal military training and universal military service are one and the same thing?

Mr. FIELDS. No, sir.

Mr. KING. I understood the gentleman to use them as the

Mr. FIELDS. I said, if we should do either; that is what I intended to say, at least.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one interruption?

Mr. FIELDS. Gladly.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman states the proposition precisely as it is. I have an open mind on this question and I am at sea to know what to do. We want the men, and my concern is, How will we get them?

Mr. FIELDS. I will give the gentleman my idea.

Mr. FESS. I have heard the story for years, in communities, that the reason so many persons came from Germany to this country was in order to avoid military service which was to be forced upon them, and I have had that thing dinged into my mind until I have a prejudice against it. I do not know where it comes from, other than that.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman's statement bears out that long-established doctrine that a man's environment becomes a part of him.

Here is my idea, which I stated a moment ago I would give to the gentleman: We must reorganize the military system of this country. We must first democratize it. We must Americanize it. We must popularize it. We must bring it closer to the people. We must conduct it in such a way that each individual will realize, to some extent at least, his individual responsibility in the encouragement and support of it.

Now, you know there is a general feeling throughout the country that the defense of the country is the other man's job. We all recognize that fact. When we talk about the defense of the country, people with whom we talk believe, as a rule, that we are discussing the other fellow's job. We need to bring the Military Establishment closer to the people. We need to teach them from the lecture platform, from the school, from the fireside, and at every opportunity, that the defense of the Nation rests alike upon the shoulders of every individual. And, Mr. Chairman, I believe in that way the issue can be brought closer to the people. I would distribute the Army posts and training camps throughout the country. If a man goes to his State capital or to some place near home to train, his parents at home do not agonize about him like they would if he were sent to the Mexican border or out into some other State. They do not feel so much as if he had gone to war. Give each State an Army post and teach the people of the State-or at least talk it to them-that it is the duty of the people of the State to make that Army post a success and to manifest interest enough in it to bring to it all the men necessary or required. Inaugurate this system and compulsory military training or service will not be essential to the defense of the country. [Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingencies of the Army: For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergency and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4$, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $50,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, an evening paper makes some statements about my position as to the proposition to increase the cost of the new bridge at Georgetown.

The contention of the War Department for a fifteen hundred thousand dollar bridge is no new thing; for almost seven years the matter has been under discussion and controversy, certain officials in the War Department insisting on a more expensive bridge at Georgetown or at H Street, so as to eliminate the necessity and possibility of the Arlington Bridge at New York Avenue, on the theory that only one bridge would be built. committee has always wished to build a substantial, handsome highway bridge at Georgetown whenever necessary, and then build a substantial bridge of enduring character and imposing appearance commensurate with the character of the other buildings in Washington, without any gewgaws, filigree, or sentimental nonsense across the river to Arlington Cemetery, which would be practically an everlasting extension of New York Avenue or some other prominent street of Washington. For a long time we thrashed out the subject with the War Department and finally convinced the department that Congress wanted a bridge to cost not more than a million dollars, exclusive of the expense of approaches and preliminaries, and we passed a bill finally, after receiving a written statement from the War Department that it could be done, authorizing the War Department to build a bridge costing a million dollars, and specifically provided that they plan a bridge to cost a million dollars and not a million and a half nor any other larger sum, and appropriated a hundred and fifty thousand dollars to defray the expenses of terminals in locating the bridge. It was the duty of the War Department to proceed to plan and build that sort of a bridge. They helped us secure the passage of the bill by urging the immediate and pressing necessity for the bridge, and yet they have permitted nearly a year to elapse, and instead of planning and building that sort of a bridge and getting that out of the way so we could authorize the other larger bridge lower down the river they have spent all that time planning a more expensive bridge, and now they say it is necessary for Congress to increase the appropriation. It appears that they were convinced against their will when they agreed to build a milliondollar bridge.

I know from long observation of construction of bridges throughout the country that a good bridge can be built for a million dollars, and I for one propose to keep faith with Congress, in which a large number of gentlemen opposed even the expenditure of a million dollars, which they considered a considerable sum to spend on that bridge. If ways are found to go around the committee, and those who conducted the bill through Congress and made the pledges as to the cost, it will be because I can not help it. I intend to make a point of order against it wherever it will lie if it comes into the House, and vote against it if it comes in under circumstances where a point of order will not lie. I insist that the War Department keep faith with Congress and build a million-dollar bridge as instructed and not a million-and-a-half-dollar bridge. The fact that their plan proposes to extend the bridge across a street and up a hill so as to bridge over dry land instead of rivers, and that they have been confused and led astray by the Fine Arts Commission is no justification. They were authorized to confer with the Fine Arts Commission, but they were not compelled to violate the law enacted by Congress and increase the expense on account of any suggestions of that commission. They ought to go on and build that bridge according to the law enacted so that Congress will have some confidence in the movement to build the larger bridge lower down the river. Such a pernicious example may be set in this instance as would discourage Members of Congress from voting for the other bridge.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that it is getting late.

Mr. TILSON. Would not the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee, agree to rise at this point?

Mr. DENT. With that disposition in the committee, I will, but I had hoped that we could read the first two or three pages of the bill, about which there would be no contest. It ought to be finished by 6 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably Senate bill 8256. accompanied it with a written report, but I desire to say that with the exception of one clause in the bill, being the last proviso of section 2, the committee was unanimous in ordering the bill to be reported favorably. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Williams] is opposed to the retention of that proviso. He will move to strike it out, and a vote will be had to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

Just a word more. Section 6 of the bill as presented provides that the President shall appoint a commission to examine into the general conditions in the Danish West India Islands and report. At the time the committee was formulating this bill we had very unsatisfactory information as to the general conditions in the islands. Since then the Secretary of Commerce has sent to us a very full and intelligent report covering the very ground intended to be covered by the proposed commission and I think it is sufficiently covered, so that section 6, when we take up the bill, will I think by the unanimous judgment of the committee be eliminated. I send the bill to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read by title.

The Secretary. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone] reports favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations the reports favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations the bill (S. 8256) to provide a government for the West India Islands acquired by the United States from Denmark.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say that at the very first opportunity, possibly on Monday, if I can, I shall ask to have the bill taken up. It is very important that it should be passed, or else in a very short while we shall have a Territory with thirty thousand and odd people upon it without any government. I repeat I shall endeavor to call up the bill at a very I repeat, I shall endeavor to call up the bill at a very early day, so that it may be disposed of. I am sure it will take only a comparatively short time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how long it will take to pass the bill, but there is a part of it to which somewhat strenuous objection will be made.

Mr. STONE. I stated that.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business, Senate bill 8148, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. Shafroth] has been recognized.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside so that the Senate may consider for a few minutes the Porto Rican bill. I will state that an amendment to meet the only difficulty which has been in the way of the passage of the bill has practically been agreed upon by both sides; in fact, it has actually been agreed upon. If the Senator from North Carolina will consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business, I think we shall get through with the Porto Rican bill in five minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina consent?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am assured by both sides that the Porto Rican bill will not take over 10 minutes in order to be disposed of, and I will consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for 15 minutes, by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move, Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion is not necessary. By unanimous consent the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside for 15 minutes for the purpose of considering what is known as the Porto Rican bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I realize that the Porto Rican bill is one of the measures which have been recommended for passage by the President of the United States, and I, as one Senator, certainly do not wish to be in the way of the passage of the measure. I therefore desire to withdraw my original amendment and to offer a substitute therefor, which I ask may now be read. Mr. LODGE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts consent to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. President, I should like, first, to have the substitute read, though I believe there is no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute proposed by the Senator from North Dakota for the amendment heretofore submitted by him will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. Gronna, it is proposed, on page 5, after line 3, to

That one year after the approval of this act and thereafter it shall be unlawful to import, manufacture, sell, or give away, or to expose for sale or gift, any intoxicating drink or drug: Provided, That the legislature may authorize and regulate importation, manufacture, and sale of said liquors and drugs for medical, sacramental, industrial, and scientific uses only. The penalty for violations of this provision with reference to intoxicants shall be a fine of not less than $25 for the first offense, and for second and subsequent offenses a fine of not less than $25 on d imprisonment for not less than one month or more than one year: And provided further, That at any general election within five years after the approval of this act this provision may, upon petition of not less than 10 per cent of the qualified electors of Porto Rico, and if a majority of all the qualified electors of Porto Rico, and if a majority of all the qualified electors of Porto Rico, over the provision shall vote to repeal this provision, it shall thereafter not be in force and effect; otherwise it shall be in full force and effect.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw my objection. The amendment is

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw my objection. The amendment is acceptable to me

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. As I have heard the amendment read, it says that at any such general election within five years after the passage of this act the question shall be submitted.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that at any general election within five years this provision may be submitted to a vote of the people of Porto Rico, and if a majority of the qualified electors shall vote to repeal this provision, of course it will not be in force or effect. Mr. JONES. When is the first general election to be held after the passage of this act?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know. This provision will go into force and effect, and if it is not to remain the law will have to be repealed by the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. JONES. I understand that; but I wondered when they would have the opportunity to have the question submittedwithin six months or a year?

Mr. LODGE. I think within a year there will be a general

Mr. JONES. There will be a general election within a year, so that the matter may be submitted within a year.

Mr. LODGE. Within a year; yes. I think there will be a general election on the 17th of July.

Mr. JONES. The Senator thinks possibly on the 17th of July of this year?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; if 10 per cent of the qualified electors

Mr. JONES. It will not be difficult for them to get 10 per cent; but if it is not repealed within five years, then there is no provision for submitting it after that?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. GRONNA. It can not be submitted to a vote of the people, I will say to the Senator from Washington, after the five-year period has expired. I would have much preferred to have had my amendment adopted in its original form; but I understand it would perhaps defeat the Porto Rican bill, and I do not wish to do that. The Congress of the United States has put prohibition into the Porto Rico bill. If the people of Porto Rico do not want it, they can repeal it; and they have five years' time in which to take that action.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not been able to attend the night sessions when this bill has been under consideration, and I therefore may be asking a question concerning a matter that has been properly looked after in the consideration of the bill; but, as I caught the reading of the amendment, the question of prohibition may be submitted at any time within five years to the qualified electors of Porto Rico. Is that correct?

Mr. GRONNA. No; not at any time, but at any general elec-

Mr. NORRIS. What I want to ask the Senator is, What has been done in regard to fixing the qualifications of the voters? I understood that this bill originally provided for a property qualification.

Mr. LODGE. That has been eliminated.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any property qualification now?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I understand not.
Mr. NORRIS. The property qualification has been eliminated?

Mr. LODGE. So I understand.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my understanding.

Mr. LODGE. I understood that all those provisions were eliminated

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for information, I desire to ask question along the line of that asked by the Senator from Nebraska. I understand that the property qualification affecting the senators and representatives is out of the bill, but that the one affecting the voters is not out of the bill. That is as I understand it. I ask if that is not the case, and if the amendments agreed to do not apply only to the senators and representatives?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber that I am unable even to hear the Senator from Utah. I wish we might have order.

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have that question answered, if there is any doubt about it, by some one who knows, or by the reading of the bill itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if I understand just what has happened to the bill in reference to the property qualification As I have my bill marked, the property qualification affecting the senators and representatives has been eliminated, but the property qualification affecting the general voters has not been. I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge if that is correct?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that there was a substitute for that section which is put in the alternative, giving the right to vote to all those who have voted, consisting of about 250,000 citizens, and also all those who can read and write, and also all those who pay a property tax of $3 per year whether they can read or write or not. That is the way it was framed, and I would rather for it to be that way.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the amendment read just as it has been agreed to in the Senate. Then we will know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the section. The Secretary. Section 35, as agreed to, is as follows:

That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters for all offices elected by the people shall have the qualifications prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes:

(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage.

(b) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English, (c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own names in an amount of not less than $3 per annum: Provided, That at all elections subsequent to the first election herein provided for no one shall be entitled or permitted to register or vote who is not at the time of registration or election a bona fide citizen of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the reading of that provision, it gives to the Legislature of Porto Rico-with the single exception that, whatever law they make, those entitled to vote must be citizens of the United States-the power to fix the qualifications of voters in accordance with one of the three different sections, (a), (b), and (c). As I understand the reading of it, they could provide that no one shall be entitled to vote except he was qualified under subsection (c), which is solely and simply a property qualification. In other words, it would give to the Legislature of Porto Rico power to exclude everybody from voting except those who possessed the requisite amount of property. They could exclude entirely those who were qualified by education. They could exclude absolutely every person who was not the owner of sufficient property to qualify him under title (c). I have not read it before, and I get my idea just from the reading by the Secretary; but as I understand that, it gives to the legislature the right to fix absolutely the qualifications. They can, it is true, provide that nobody shall vote unless he has the educational qualification provided in subsection (b), I believe. They can also provide that he must have the qualifications provided in subsection (a). It is within their power to permit voting to be done by persons having the qualifications prescribed by any one or all of these sections.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What does the Senator suggest there?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe that we ought to give to the Legislature of Porto Rico the right to say that no one shall vote unless he is possessed of the requisite amount of property named in the statute and pays that much tax every year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is the Senator willing to let it go if that is eliminated?

Mr. NORRIS. As I read it, it seems to me that that is the most objectionable part of it. I have not any objection to an educational test

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think an educational test is good.

Mr. NORRIS. So do I.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is in the interest of education.

NORRIS. But this legislature can absolutely abolish all tests of an educational nature under this law. They may say in so many words that no one shall be a voter in Porto Rico unless he possesses the requisite amount of property, regardless of education and regardless of everything else.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator be satisfied if we strike out the property qualification?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would improve it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the Senator in charge of the bill ought to make an arrangement just with one Senator. There are a number of Senators who are opposed to any modification, and we would like to come to a vote upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede that the position taken by the Senator from Georgia is a logical one. I am only taking the position as one Senator. I can not expect to have it modified just to suit me. I am not asking such a thing. But I do not believe I would be willing to vote for a bill that would give to the legislature the right to take away the right of suffrage from everybody in the island except those who paid a certain amount of tax. I do not believe that is a good qualification, and it can be made the only one.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to have the amendment read again.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be glad to have it read. I have heard it read but once.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will read the amendment as it was agreed to in Committee of the Whole:

SEC. 35. That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters for all offices elected by the people shall have the qualifications prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes:

(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage.

(b) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English.

(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum: Provided, That at all elections subsequent to the first election berein provided for no one shall be entitled or permitted to register or vote who is not at the time of registration or election a bona fide citizen of the United States.

Mr. President, I say that the Porto Rican people themselves have been studying that question thoroughly, and it is their amendment that has been brought up here. There are representatives in this Capitol now who represent the various political parties down there, and they have agreed on this amendment. I think the amendment ought to remain in the bill, but in order to get the bill through I am willing to concede a great will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Senator— Mr. FALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico

Mr. FALL. Do I understand that this is the bill of the Senator from Colorado we are now discussing or is it the committee bill or the House bill or some other bill providing a government for Porto Rico? I am a member of the committee, and I should like to be informed on the subject, seriously.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the inquiry of the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was made to the Chair, and the Chair does not know.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to discuss the amendment then just a little bit. I have now placed in my hands a copy of the amendment. As I read it, I do not believe there can be any doubt but that the Legislature of Porto Rico will be able to fix the qualifications of the electors in that island as they see fit, provided they come within the limits of this particular part of the law. They can change it from time to time as they desire. They may have a qualification one year which will be entirely of an educational nature, and the next year they can fix it entirely upon the ownership of property.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me for just a moment. The next year they can put it in another class, and that class consists of those people who at the election of 1917 were legal voters. The law says they "shall have the qualifications prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes." Let us assume that the legislature provides that they shall be comprised entirely within class (a), what will that mean? Class (a) consists of "those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage." That means that nobody else can vote except those who were entitled to vote in 1917 and who did vote in 1917. Let us see how that will work out. The next year the qualifications, let us assume, were unchanged. A part of these people die; a number of them may have passed away. Then those who were entitled to vote are less in number. The next year many more die, and in the course of time there are only one or two of them left, and they are the only qualified voters in Porto Rico. Eventually there will be no qualified voters, because after a while they must all die, unless they are different from all the people I am acquainted with. So if the legislature wanted to confine the voting population of that island to a select few and would provide that they all shall be in class (a), as we have designated them, the electorate would grow less and less, until the island would be controlled entirely by a few people—those who had the qualification to vote because they exercised the right to vote in 1917. Do we want to do that? Are we going to give to the legislature that power? Are we going to say that they shall have the power to provide that no man shall vote in Porto Rico except he has a qualification in the holding of property and provided that he pays taxes every year? It seems to me that we ought to fix more definitely the qualifications of voters, and we ought to do it here; we ought to do it in this proposed law. I think there are two of those three provisions that are dangerous.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator suggest an amendment? Mr. NORRIS. This is the first time that it has been called to my attention, I will say to the Senator, and at least instead of giving them power to confine it to one of those classes, if we are going to have all those qualification in we ought to say that any one of those would be a sufficient qualification, and that they would not be given the power to take it away.

have given the power to take it away.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let the Senator suggest an amendment. Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator would strike out the words "one of," I think he would reach the object he is trying to

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, striking out one or two words I do not think will reach the objection of the Senator at all. proposition is simply this: Are we willing to leave it to the Legislature of Porto Rico to fix the qualifications of voters at subsequent elections after the first election, subject only to the restriction that they shall be citizens of the United States? That is as the committee bill stands to-day. The amendment adopted here, as I undertook to point out the other night to the Senator from New Jersey, was not reaching what he intended to reach. There is no question about the fact that the Senator from Nebraska is absolutely right. As the amendment stands to-day, the Legislature of Porto Rico can take either of the two first classes and provide a property qualification within those classes. There is nothing in the bill to prohibit them from so doing.

But I wish to point out to the Senate that the Senate to-day is vesting, under the Senate amendment, sovereign power in the Legislature of Porto Rico, subject only to the restrictions that their laws may be affirmatively disapproved by Congress, the same power which is vested in any State legislature under the constitution of that State; and in some respects the organic act which we are prescribing contains fewer limitations upon the legislative power of Porto Rico than do the majority of the State constitutions on the legislative power in the State. I do not wonder that the chairman of the committee, if I may be allowed to offer a suggestion, is willing to accept anything anyone offers in the nature of an objection when he does not even understand what the objections are.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say that we have had a great deal of trouble with this bill. We have in it a veto power on the part of Congress at any time. If the Porto Rican Legislature does not do what is right, we have the right to repeal their action. I want to get the bill into conference. I have been laboring for eight months to get it into conference.

Mr. FALL. I understand that; but I for one feel that there are certain obligations upon me as a Senator in this body, and, with due deference to the chairman of the committee and his exceeding anxiety to get the bill into conference, I propose that we shall legislate here and not in conference. I am going to undertake, so long as I remain in this body, to voice my objection to bills here in the open and not leave it to some secret session of a conference committee to legislate as to the constitutional rights of this body that under the Constitution is to legislate. I am not willing to leave it to two or three conferees. I think we are able to do it, that we are intelligent enough to listen to objections which may be urged or suggestions that may be made, so that Senators may understand something of the conditions existing in Porto Rico. Is this body not intelligent enough to say what should be done and what we are willing to do with reference to self-government in Porto Rico? Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit a suggestion. I wish to call attention to another thing in this amendment. It is not in regard to the qualifications of voters, but it says:

Thereafter voters for all offices elected by the people.

We have provided in this bill for the possibility of a referendum on the liquor question. Why should the qualification of the voters for office to be elected by the people be different from what the qualifications might be on a referendum of that kind? If that language remains, there would be one qualification for officers and another and a different qualification, possibly, for a referendum like that which we have already provided for in

Mr. FALL. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I can see no reason for a different rule whatsoever. Why a different rule has been adopted as the matter stands now I can not answer. Yet it has been suggested that it may be fixed in conference. Mr. President, we might just as well, it seems to me, understand that we are dealing with a condition which very few of us do understand. We are providing here the utmost measure of self-government for the people of Porto Rico. In the first place, those people have two aspirations. Divided very largely in two parties, they have had practical assurance from leaders of sentiment in the United States that they would never achieve either of their aspirations-one that it should become an independent republic and the other that it should get statehood. They have been told by the leaders of both parties, by the leaders of the sentiment as it is reported here in the United States, that they would neither become independent on the one hand, nor be allowed to enter the system of statehood upon the other.

Necessarily they differ when they come before a committee. They do not know what qualifications for voters they want, possibly, because it is possible the Republican Party, upon the one hand, has one ultimate object in view; the Union Party, upon the other, has confessedly another object in view; and the two attempting to achieve different ends have different ideas as to what should be embodied in a bill vesting in Porto Rico the right to self-government. I am frank to say that I think very few Members of the Senate understand what they are attempting to legislate about at all.

As to the matter now in issue raised by the Senator, if the Senator desires to preclude the Legislature of Porto Rico from putting additional qualifications upon either of the two first classes of voters provided for, then all he has to do, if the qualifications suit him and only citizens of the United States shall vote, if he is satisfied with this language, then his amendment should simply be to strike out the provision vesting in the Porto Rican Legislature the right to fix the qualifications of voters. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to give

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to offer as a substitute for section 35:

SEC. 35. That the qualified electors shall be all males who are 21 years of age and over and who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, to my mind the milk in the coconut in this whole situation is the fact that the great franchises in that island and sugar plantations are owned by a clique of wealthy men in the United States, in England, and in Scotland, and it is their purpose and desire to control the elections in the island. Qualified with the electorate they are practically in possession of the island. I can not from my standpoint see how we can adopt any feature of the conditions a, b, c proposed. I offer my amendment as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course the amendment is not now in order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I offer it to be taken up when it may be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will never be in order unless the vote whereby the amendment was adopted by the Senate has been reconsidered.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Then I move to reconsider it. Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that it be taken up in the Senate. want to get the bill as far along as I can. I do not think I want to get the bill as far along as I can. there are any other objections to the bill, and let us get the bill in the Senate. Then if the Senator desires to propose his amendment, all right.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right; I will withhold it until the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator might just as well ask for a reconsideration

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will ask for a reconsidera-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment as a substitute for section 35, which will be stated.

The Secretary. In lieu of section 35 insert:

SEC. 35. That the qualified electors shall be all males who are 21 years of age and over and who are citizens of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think it would be a great mistake to put upon those islands a government of this character. I would be utterly opposed to giving them any government on such a basis. Who are the people who live there? How much ignorance is there? How much lack of capacity to vote? How much utter lack of knowledge of the responsibility of suffrage? You do not propose to allow the legislature to put any limitation on suffrage. You abolish the wise limitations provided by the committee. The committee's limitation is capacity to read and write. Anyone who can read and write in the Spanish or English language can vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And anyone who can not can learn in six months.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Anyone who pays taxes to the amount of $3, if he can not read and write, is allowed to register.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator believe that the legislature could take away the right of anyone to vote, even though he could read and write under this amendment that has been considered and agreed to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It says that anyone who can read and write is allowed to be a voter. That does not follow unless the legislature says so. The legislature can say that they shall not be voters, as I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I am addressing myself to is the proposition that every citizen of the United States shall have the right to vote who is 21 years of age, without reference to the capacity of the citizen to vote.

Mr. NORRIS. My question of course did not pertain to that. I think there is great force in the Senator's argument, but the Senator was stating that under the proposed law as the committee had brought it in, anyone who could read and write in the Spanish or in the English language would be a qualified voter. That does not necessarily follow, as I understand it; for the legislature, if they so desired, could provide that such per-sons could not vote. We have given them the power to take that right away

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the amendment should be to strike out the provision in the bill which gives the local legislature the right to withdraw suffrage under the limitations prescribed by Congress

I am opposed to passing this bill unless some kind of limitation as to suffrage attaches to it or else we give the local legislature the right to attach some limitation as to suffrage. It is simply impossible to tell what will be done down there if every irresponsible man 21 years old has an equal voice in the control of the island. We know perfectly well that a large number, at least, of the inhabitants of the island are not prepared for suffrage. I would be willing to accept the proposition that a man who can read and write shall vote; I would be willing to accept the proposition that a man who pays a small amount of taxes, though he can not read and write, shall vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator from Georgia be willing to accept an amendment to the amendment by striking out the words "prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be," so that the section would read:

That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified voters shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters for all offices elected by the people shall have the qualifications comprised within one of the following classes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be willing to accept that.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, with those words stricken out, the legis-lature could not change the qualifications at any time. The qualifications could only be changed by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would accept that. I really would prefer to provide that no one should vote who could not read and write, and I would be perfectly willing to stop there. I am, however, willing to go one step further, and provide that anyone who pays taxes on a limited amount of property may vote, although he can not read and write, but there ought to be some restriction.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator one question, following up the one which I first asked him. Would he be willing to modify those qualifications by striking out qualification

(c), which provides:

Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would. I am not seeking to broaden the suffrage; I am seeking to limit it. I think it is essential to good government in that island that there should be a limitation of suffrage, and a limitation that requires a capacity to read and write is not a severe restriction.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. With the permission of the Senator from New Jersey, I want to offer two or three amendments to the substi-tute. I should like the attention of the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from New Jersey, and the Senator from Colorado.

In the first place, I think we ought to strike out these words, commencing in line 3 and ending in line 4, " for all offices elected by the people," so that we shall not have a different qualification for the election of officers than we would have for voting for the referendum, as we provide in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the word "qualifications," at the end of line 4, I move to insert the word "following," so that it will read "the following qualifications." Then I move to strike out the words "prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes," so that it

The following qualifications:
(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage—

Then after the word "suffrage" insert the word "or," so as to read-or (b) those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English.

It strikes me it would be a very good idea to stop there, and not put the other qualification in; but if you put the other one in add the word "or," so that a man would be entitled to vote if he had any one of these different qualifications; and the qualification to vote for an officer would be the same as the qualification to vote at a referendum like the one we have submitted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would just as soon have the word "or" in.

Mr. NORRIS. To begin with, to get somewhere, Mr. President, I move to strike out the words "for all offices elected by the people.'

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I move to amend by inserting after the word "have," in line 4, the words "one of." The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask that the amendment be again stated.
Mr. NORRIS. I move after the word "have," in line 4, to insert the words "one of."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. NORRIS. Now, after the word "the," in the same line,
I move to insert what I send to the desk.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.
The SECRETARY In line 4 of the the word "the" and before

The Secretary. In line 4, after the word "the," and before the word "qualifications," it is proposed to insert the word "following."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I also offer the amendment which I send to the desk

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. After the word "qualification," in line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico and be comprised within one of the following classes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the amend-

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I now have another amendment to submit, but bfore doing so I want to say that I am not myself satisfied in regard to it; but I offer it in order to get the question before the Senate and that we may make some headway. It seems to me that we ought not to have a property qualification for voters.

Mr. President-

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.
Mr. FALL. I think if the Senator will leave that qualification in, he will simply provide another class of voters. It does not limit either of the first two classes; and I think it is very properly left in. I think the Senator from Nebraska will agree with me that this provides a third class; in other words, that if a man is not now a resident, although he may not be a legal voter at this election, although, second, he may not be able to either read or write either language, yet if he is a taxpayer he may still be a voter. I do not think it limits the qualifications in either of the other respects, but it adds an additional class of veters

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Before I yield the floor I want to add another amendment, which I think is necessary. I want to add after the word "voters," in line 3, the words "shall be 21 years of age and," so that it will read:

Thereafter voters shall be 21 years of age and shall have one of the following qualifications.

I take it that if we do not fix an age qualification here, we might be in great danger.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Twenty-one years of age is the time fixed in my substitute. That is the amendment which

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator included the provision that they shall be citizens of the United States, or would he add that in connection with the provision as to being 21 years of age?

Mr. NORRIS. That is a good suggestion. That they shall be 21 years of age Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And citizens of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. And citizens of the United States. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And "possessing one of the following qualifications.

Mr. NORRIS. With the word "and" following, so that the amendment would be after the word "voters," in line 3, to insert the words "shall be citizens of the United States and 21 years of age, and."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That would include as well the literacy test. I think it would be futile to put that in the bill. We know of recent knowledge from the action of our President in connection with another matter that he would probably veto the bill with that in it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Senator the provision will be still open to amendment when the amendments I have suggested are agreed to, and a motion can be made to strike out any of the qualifications. The Senator will be at liberty to make such a motion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will suggest to the Senator—
Mr. NORRIS. But I think it is conceded that voters in Porto Rico ought to be citizens of the United States and ought to be 21 years of age, and that is all the last suggestion proposes to incorporate in the provision.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My substitute comprehended all that

Mr. NORRIS. I know it did.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that subdivision (a) provides that all those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right to vote can do so without regard to the educational qualifications.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not see the purpose of putting that in. I think my substitute would accomplish the whole purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator from New Jersey will he not consent to the amendment that I have suggested, as that does not take away from him or any other Senator the right to make a motion to strike out further down?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My substitute is before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there can not be any objection to providing that they must be citizens of the United States and must be 21 years of age. If that amendment is agreed to, or, even if it is disagreed to, the provision will still be open to further amendment, and the Senator can move to strike out the literacy test if he wants to do so.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to strike out not only the literacy test, but I want to strike out each one of the qualifications mentioned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska providing an age qualification been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the section as it now reads.

The Secretary. As amended section 35 now reads:

Sec. 35. That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters shall be citizens of the United States and 21 years of age and shall have one of the following qualifications—

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—— Mr. HUGHES. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to hear the amendment stated

The VICE PRESIDENT. There certainly can be no objection to at least stating the amendment as it now stands without

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask that the Secretary read the amendment as it now stands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will please read the amendment as it now stands in order that we may get somewhere if we can.

Mr. HUGHES. The Secretary did read it, did he not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; he did not read the qualifications. He only read down to that point.

The Secretary. As it now stands, section 35 reads as fol-

SEC. 35. That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters shall be citizens of the United States and 21 years of age and shall have one of the following qualifications:

states and 21 years of age and shall have one of the tollowing quantifications:

(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage.

(b) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English,
(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per aunum.

Mr. CLAPP. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I submit that the Senator from Georgia has not submitted to the Senate as yet that portion of the amendment which comprises a property qualification.

Mr. NORRIS. No. Mr. CLAPP. Yet it appears here as part of the amendment as perfected by the Senator from Nebraska.

It is still a part of the provision, but it is Mr. NORRIS. subject to a motion to strike it out. That motion has not yet been made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. Mr. SMOOT. Section 35 as amended on motion of the Sena-

That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law; thereafter voters shall have one of the following qualifications—

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator did not read it all. He left out the words "shall be citizens of the United States and 21 years of age.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that provision was just submitted by the Senator and adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And possessed of "one of the following qualifications."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator what is there in this bill that would prevent the Legislature of Porto Rico from imposing 40 other qualifications, if they desire to do so?

Mr. NORRIS. Unless we give them authority so to do, the legislature would not have any right to impose any other quali-If we define what the qualifications of voters shall fications. be, the Legislature of Porto Rico can not repeal that act of

Mr. SMOOT. It will not be able to repeal the qualifications provided for by act of Congress, but will it not have the right to provide additional qualifications?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. We have stricken out the words "prescribed by the Legislature of Porto Rico," and so forth.
 Mr. SMOOT. I believe that under the provisions of this bill the legislature will have that right.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what are the present qualifications

Mr. SHAFROTH. The present qualifications of voters are that they shall be 21 years of age and shall have resided one year in Porto Rico.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Are there no other conditions?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think not. This bill proposes to make them citizens of the United States, but they are now citizens of Porto Rico, and they have been voting down there one at a time.

to the extent of some 250,000, which was approximately the vote at the last election. There was a very large vote,

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Then, I should like to inquire, if the present conditions have proven satisfactory and good order has been maintained at elections, why not continue the present arrangement? Why put in these (a), (b), (c), propositions?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the act providing a government for the Philippines there is an educational qualification. Nobody in the Philippine Islands can vote unless he can read or write. These bills are supposed to relate somewhat to each other; and by reason of that there was first provided simply an educational qualification or a property qualification. There was objection to that in the committee, and we at last agreed that the people of Porto Rico should have 10 years to prepare in which to qualify themselves educationally; but on the floor of the Senate several nights ago, when we had the matter up for considera-tion, it was enlarged, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Poindexter], to include every-body who has heretofore voted. That is the condition; and it seems to me that that is a good amendment; but to the suggestions made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] I do not see any serious objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is one other question which I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska in relation to the subject matter about which I was just speaking. This section, if adopted, will provide that the voters of Porto Rico shall have certain qualifications. There is nothing in the bill that says that the legislature thereafter may not provide additional qualifications. There is nothing to prevent the Legislature of Porto Rico from imposing any qualifications other than those provided for in this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I hesitate to add to the complicated condition of affairs here, but I should like to know whether it is the intention of this bill to fix the qualification of voters for the first election and then change the qualifications for all other elections? That is the effect of this amendment as it now stands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that that complication arises from the fact that at the present time only Porto Ricans are permitted to vote. Some others may exercise that privilege, but ninety-nine one-hundredths of the voters are Porto Ricans. They are not now citizens of the United States, and if we were to prescribe that only citizens of the United States were to vote at the first election there would not be anybody who could vote. Consequently, we are obliged to make a distinction between the first election and the subsequent elections. So we prescribe that all those who voted in the last general election shall be entitled to vote at the election in 1917. Then we prescribe that thereafter those shall be entitled to vote who are citizens of the United States and who were eligible to vote and who voted in 1917 and possess one of the qualifications mentioned.

Mr. WORKS. Then, the effect of it is to allow voters who would not be qualified primarily under the provisions of this act to fix the conditions in the beginning, by the provisions that are contained in this amendment, so that a large proportion of them evidently will be disfranchised.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; very few of them.
Mr. WORKS. That is the effect of it.
Mr. SHAFROTH. Very few of them will be disfranchised, if any, because on account of the qualifications including those who voted at the last general election, they will evidently vote again, and consequently they will become permanent voters.

Mr. WORKS. But, Mr. President, under the provisions of this amendment they would not be entitled to vote unless they had one or the other of these three qualifications.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But one of the very qualifications is, "those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage"; so that takes in the great mass of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You see, Mr. President, that carries as a permanent qualification for suffrage the right to vote to those who vote in this coming election.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, that is precisely where the Senator is mistaken. The provision is that thereafter they shall have certain and fixed qualifications, and that would exclude those who voted at the last election.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator from California—Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from California will permit

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order, and said: The Chair is entirely willing that Senators shall proceed, but only

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have I the floor, Mr. President?
Mr. NORRIS. I did not know the Senator was trying to proceed. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, I will permit the Senator to proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one moment. The Senator from California is mistaken. That language is perfectly clear as the Senator from Nebraska has perfected it. It provides that after this first election a voter must have one of the three following qualifications. Now, what are those qualifications?

First, those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage. If he falls within that class, he has the qualification.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. FALL. He has the qualification, provided in the meantime he has become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That we add, of course. We do not propose in future, after this first election, to let anybody vote who is not a citizen of the United States and 21 years old. think everybody agrees to that. But, being a citizen of the United States and being 21 years of age, he must have one of three additional qualifications, as it reads now. What is the first one of those? He must have been qualified to vote and have exercised the privilege at the election in 1917.

Mr. STONE. I will ask the Senator if it would not be well In that first qualification to add, right at the beginning, "being a citizen of the United States"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is not necessary, because we preface the three with the statement, first, that he must be a citizen of the United States, he must be 21 years of age, and he must possess one of the three following additional qualifications. Being a citizen of the United States and being 21 years of age, he need have but one of the three following qualifications. What is the first qualification? Let me read it:

Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage,

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, after the explanation of the Senator from Georgia, I admit that it is not quite as bad as

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, we carry as a permanent right, if he becomes a citizen of the United States and is 21 years of age, the privilege of suffrage to the man who exercises the privilege in this coming election. Second, outside of those who vote in this coming election, if they are citizens of the United States and 21 years of age, we say, "If you can read and write in Spanish or English, you can register and vote." Now, third, as it stands at present, we say, "Even if you do not vote in the coming election in 1917, even if you can not read and write in Spanish or in English, still if you are a property holder, a citizen of the United States, and 21 years of age, though your property only requires you to pay a tax of $3 per year, you can register and vote."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not care to be interrupted by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not let the Senator interrupt me, under the rules

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator need not worry.

I am not going to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this third privilege is, I think, a very proper one; but if the amendment is stronger without it, let it go. I believe that a man in Porto Rico who is a taxpayer has a certain stability attached to him, is likely to be a permanent resident, is more likely to be domiciled in the island, than if he were a mere mover from place to place. I do not care particularly whether that remains or not. What I do insist upon, however, is that, besides those that we allow to vote who are now voters and who exercise the right in the election of 1917, we should maintain some restrictions, and I think the knowledge and capacity to read and write in English or in Spanish is not an unreasonable requirement for those whose names are to be added to the list of those who can now vote in

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. NORRIS addressed the

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia was very impatient with me. I was only trying to ask him a question that I thought might enlighten me.

It seems to me that it is utterly out of place to reason or to argue this literacy or educational test at this time. We have thrashed that over and over again. We have passed the bill here including it, and the President vetoed it. We would have the same experience, in my judgment, again.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. What I am going to say is not intended in any sense as a reflection upon the President. But the Congress has overruled the veto, and, of course, by the same token it would undoubtedly overrule it as to the government of an alien people by this Government.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am conscious of that fact; but the fact still remains that my opinion is not changed.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President-

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to say that almost every educational magazine in our country and the great metropolitan journals of our country with a remarkable unanimity have not sustained the action of our Congress on that particular

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—
Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I believe that it is unfortunate, and I believe it is utterly un-American, and certainly un-Democratic; and, for the life of me, I can not vote for it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to a distinction which he seems to have overlooked? The literacy test only applied to immigrants entering the country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, yes.

Mr. POMERENE. This is defining the qualifications of one who shall exercise the right of franchise.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes. Well, if it had any pardon at all for those entering the country, it certainly has no pardon for those who have been born mayhap in the island and are citizens of the United States.

Then, the other qualifications which the Senator says he is not tenacious about-the $3 tax. Now, a man must have something upon which to be taxed; so it is tantamount to a property qualification.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that that is not a limitation, but is an extension of the franchise?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, well, all right; put it as you may. The fact is that if he has not either one of these other qualifications he has to have the tax qualification. pose he has neither of them. Now, I insist that the lack of property is a misfortune, and not necessarily a crime. should not be penalized because he is poor. I know there is a certain disposition to put on a property qualification and a literacy test, an educational test. Now, I want to say—

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. When we reach a vote on the Senator's amendment I propose to vote for it; but in the meantime, if the Senator will bear with me, it seems to me that we ought, if we can, and as far as we can, to perfect the pending amendment. If the Senator will yield, I should like to move to strike from the pending amendment the words "Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per Then, if we were unable to substitute the Senator's amendment, we would at least, if my amendment prevails, have freed the pending amendment from what I regard as an undemocratic proposition—a property qualification.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I would be quite willing to vote with the Senator on that proposition, to strike it out.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me at this time, and will yield for that purpose, I move to strike out of the pending amendment, paragraph (c):

Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum.

Mr. President, in making that motion, of course, I know it will be said that paragraph (c) enlarges the possibility of suffrage; but it enlarges a thousand times more the possibility of controlling the electorate of Porto Rico. If there should be an influence that seeks to control the electorate of Porto Rico. it will be very difficult for that influence to educate voters so that they can pass the educational test. It will be very easy to furnish a tax receipt of $3 to those men whom they want to vote along the line of certain interests. While theoretically section (c) enlarges the right of suffrage, I repeat that it enlarges a thousandfold the opportunity of forces to control the electorate, if that condition be possible in the future govern-ment of Porto Rico. ent of Porto Rico.

I move to strike out subdivision (c).

Vevy Jersey. Well

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well— Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; with pleasure. Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think I have the floor, but still

Mr. STERLING. This does not provide that the voter, in order to be a qualified voter, shall have paid his tax.

Mr. CLAPP. No. Mr. STERLING. He must be a taxpayer in the amount of $3 per annum. Mr. CLAPP. But, lacking the educational qualification, if he does show that he has paid $3 per annum, then he is entitled to vote, so far as we give him the power to vote. I want to remind the Senate that the Senator from Utah has raised a question here that is vital. We do not say in this amendment that the men who have these qualifications can vote. We simply say that they must, among other things, possess these qualifications. Clearly, if a man had been convicted of a fel-ony the Legislature of Porto Rico could prohibit his voting, notwithstanding he had these qualifications.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think the Porto Rican Legislature should have that power?

Mr. CLAPP. Unquestionably.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is those people that are voting for the Porto Rican Legislature.

Mr. CLAPP. We were laughing down here the proposition of the Senator from Utah. I think we ought to take time enough to consider these things, and consider them on their merits.

Mr. President, I move to amend the pending amendment by striking out clause (c):

Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

It is proposed to strike out subdivision (c), The SECRETARY. on lines 12 and 13, as follows:

(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just one word in regard to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. Of course we have been used so long to a system which does not provide for a property qualification, and it is so inconsistent with our own ideas of democracy and democratic institutions, that we naturally rebel against any such idea. It occurs to me, however, that conditions must be altogether different in Porto Rico and among the people of Porto Rico than they are in the United States, and that there must be a very large class that would have no appreciation whatever of the right of suffrage. It seems to me that there ought to be here some slight property qualification to apply to those who can neither read nor write.

I can conceive of this as the situation—a great mass of people, many thousands of them, in Porto Rico who would hardly understand what was meant by the exercise of the right of suffrage and what it implies. I think we ought to proceed cautiously here in the matter of conferring suffrage upon these people, and there should be either a qualification requiring them to be able to read and write in English or in Spanish or a slight property qualification. Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But, Mr. President, we have been educating these people, I think, for 10 or 12 or 15 years. Then, further than that, I want to say that I have presented here a petition, I think, of 12,000 names from Porto Rico rebelling at the propositions contained in this bill as being un-American and not up to the standard that we have proclaimed to the world as to what we stood for. I should regret very much to see either one of those qualifications left in the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to something that I think he has overlooked in this bill.

The language that he has drawn does not seem to me to be an The language that he has drawn does not seem to me to be applicable. It frequently happens, as we all know, when we attempt to amend legislation on the floor, that we use unhappy language. It seems to me that result has been achieved this morning.

On line 4 the language of the amendment deals with qualifications. First, it refers to certain qualifications. Then we go down and enumerate (a), (b), and (c), which are not qualifiations, but which are people.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I say, the language of the amendment deals with qualifications. We say they shall have the following qualifications: (a), (b), and (c). Well, (a), (b), and (c) do not deal with qualifications; they deal with people—"those," "those," "those." So that, to say the least, the language is ungrammatical.

Also, the Senator from Utah suggested that we were granting no particular rights to these people, and a reading of the language seemed to bear out what he said. In order to get this taxes that are due."

amendment perfected, so that we will have a proper choice between the substitute offered by the Senator from New Jersey and this amendment as perfected by the Senator from Nebraska, I would suggest that the language take this form: I would leave undisturbed the first clause, and, on line 3, after the semicolon, I would have it read as follows:

Thereafter, voters shall be-

(a) Those—— and (b) Those—— and (c) Those——.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I think it would carry out his idea if he would put the word "or" between those different clauses. If he did not, the voter would have to possess all three of the qualifications named in subdivisions (a), (b), and (c)

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; the Senator is correct about that. wanted to call attention to the fact that the language that comes before the semicolon in the amendment is absolutely clear, and is lacking in the vagueness that characterizes the language that immediately follows the semicolon.

The language is as follows:

That at the first election held pursuant to this act the qualified electors shall be those having the qualifications of voters under the present law.

That is absolutely clear and unmistakable.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not changed. Mr. HUGHES. That is not changed. I would follow that form for the balance of the paragraph and say thereafter voters shall be-

(a) Those who at the election of 1917 were legal voters and exercised the right of suffrage; and

(b) Those who are able to read and write either Spanish or English; and

(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator would not connect it with the conjunctive "and"? I call attention also that, in addition, they must be citizens of the United States and must be 21 years was only trying to perfect the three divisions.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not intended to touch that part at all.

Mr. NORRIS. After all, let me say to the Senator the pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and I would suggest that we take up this matter after that is disposed of.

Mr. HUGHES. I thought that had been acted on.

Mr. CLAPP. No. Mr. NORRIS. I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota I intend to vote for his amendment; yet I can see, I think, a great deal of weight in the argument made by those who are opposed to it. I feel as though I ought to vote with the Senator to strike it out, but it ought to be amended before the motion to strike out is voted on; and I intended to offer this amendment, but other things came in and I did not get an opportunity. Qualification (b) provides that they must be bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum. I take it, it would not mean that they had necessarily paid the taxes. It seems to me if we make a property qualification at all, and I am not in favor of doing it, we ought to provide that they not only shall be taxpayers, but that they shall have actually paid the taxes that are due against them. I wanted to move to add the words "and have paid all such taxes." I am not able to offer that amendment now because, under the parliamentary situation we are in, it would be in the third degree; but if there is not any objection to that amendment, in order that we may perfect the particular part that the Senator from Minnesota seeks to strike out, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to offer the amendment before the vote is taken on the Senator's motion to strike out.

Mr. CLAPP. As far as I am concerned, I would gladly accede to that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can not do that.

Mr. CLAPP. I was going to say that I would be one to accept it by unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. I can offer it if no one objects, and it can be done by unanimous consent, even though in the third degree, I take it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in the third degree. The pending motion is the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]

Mr. NORRIS. In line 13, I move to add "and have paid all such taxes.'

Mr. SMOOT. Should not the words be "all such taxes that may be due"

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection. Let it read "all such

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the motion of the Senator from Minnesota prevails, it goes out, and it does not need any amend-

Mr. NORRIS. I understand; but it would make a different proposition in voting on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to strike out. I only seek to apply the well-known rule that we ought to have an opportunity to perfect the language that is sought to be stricken out before we vote on striking it out. There may be Senators who would be in favor of striking it out under one condition and opposed to it if that language is in the bill, and I should like to see it amended as I have suggested.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska in regard to the last proposed amendment in lines 12 and 13. The amendment, it proposed amendment in lines 12 and 13. seems to me, suggests the very question raised by the Senator from Minnesota a while ago, when he stated as the ground of objection to lines 12 and 13 that certain interests would pay the taxes of certain voters. If the right to vote depends upon the payment of the taxes, that very thing will happen. I think the amendment ought to stand as it is, and a person ought to be a qualified voter when he is a taxpayer without requiring that he should pay the taxes before he exercises the right of suffrage.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from South Dakota has emphasized the reason why I was so ready to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. It would strengthen my argument, it would make it so plain and palpable that I wish it were in here. If it were in my power I would put it in before the motion to strike out was voted on.

Mr. STERLING. Let me ask the Senator from Minnesota— Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from South Dakota does not object to my right to offer the amendment?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly not.
Mr. NORRIS. Then we will vote upon it.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add after the words "per annum," in line 13, the words "and have paid all such taxes that are due," so as to read:

(c) Those who are bona fide taxpayers in their own name in an amount of not less than $3 per annum and have paid all such taxes as are due.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there has been rather a peculiar parliamentary position this morning on many amendments. Somebody gets the floor on an amendment, somebody else gets it upon an amendment or a motion or to interpolate a great variety of provisions while the floor is held. The amendment to the amendment stands by unanimous consent; nobody has been heard; it has been adopted; a Senator holding the floor occupies it to the exclusion of every other Senator; and so divers amendments have been added that nobody seems at present to have a very clear understanding of. I have tried keep the run of affairs as best I could. The Chair has been helpless to enforce ordinary parliamentary procedure because the business has seemed by unanimous consent to take the other

This amendment that seeks to provide for the qualification for voters, I think, ought to go further than even the amendment to the amendment. The last amendment that is provided by the Senator from Nebraska with sundry additions made by a number of other Senators, the names of whom are too numerous to mention, to quote a sales-bill phrase, would be to still further limit the ability of the voter by requiring him to pay taxes due. Some objection is made that the candidate might pay the past due taxes to qualify the voters. That is a favorite procedure in some parts of our United States.

I do not know why in our insular possessions one of these embryo citizens should be denied the same right that citizens of continental United States are not denied. I know of parts of the country where candidates pay the poll tax in order to qualify a number of electors to exercise the privilege of an American citizen. I know other States-there might be something in the corrupt-practices act not to permit that—where the delinquent voter borrows money, presumably to pay his taxes. not borrow from the candidate, he borrows it from the bank, and some friend of the candidate stands as security, and the voter by some unusual dereliction which is understood omits to obey the cashier's order when the note matures to take up the negotiable paper, and the friend of the candidate pays it, and the eternal triangle, as divorce suits have it, is complete-the candidate and the voter and the security on the note in the bank, That is a very well-known procedure.

I know of no reason why we ought to deny citizens of Porto Rico as much right as we have in our own country. Still if we ment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP].

continue these inhibitions after a while we will be unable to pay the $3-a-vear tax for the voter

I should like to inquire either from the chairman of the committee or anybody else who possesses the information whether a woman in Porto Rico under this act can be a Territorial Member of the Senate. I should like to inquire whether a woman under this act could be a legislator of the lower house in Porto Rico. I would like to inquire whether under the qualification of voters a woman in Porto Rico can not vote under this proposed law. I want that disposed of before I finally vote on the bill, or I shall vote against it, however beneficial the provisions may be,

I want to know why the amendment offered by the senior Senator from New Jersey ought not to be adopted. It seems to add the qualifications that, in addition to being citizens, they shall be male citizens. A woman is a citizen of the United States without any suffrage clause, constitutional or statutory. A woman in Porto Rico possesses the status of a citizen in the United States under the treaty by which we acquired that Territory. Any person who possesses civil rights is a citizen. Political rights are an entirely different matter. The right to vote is a distinctly added qualification to that of citizen of the United States.

I think the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey Is a necessary amendment. I am not ready yet to extend the right of woman suffrage to Porto Rico when we do not have it in some 35 or 36 States of the United States. However advantageous it might be, however necessary to carry on the extension of the universal right of suffrage regardless of sex, I prefer that we confine our missionary efforts to the United States until at least we have enlarged the limits in the United States before we go to any of our insular possessions.

To go further on this line, it seems to me that unless we hedge very carefully the qualifications of a voter and of a member of the Territorial or insular legislature we will have an unwise act.

These islands, in common with many others in this part of the country and in Central and South America, were originally Spanish colonial possessions. In none of the colonial possessions of the Spanish Crown was there a qualification or the ability on the part of the subject to take any part in local self-They were governed by viceroys, by representatives of the Spanish Crown, by various names, and for many centuries there was none of the antecedent training that tends to make an American citizen.

Now, we undertake to apply our method of extending the right of suffrage of fixing qualifications to a Spanish Territory. Their traditions, their education, and their general knowledge that is necessary to make a Territorial government do not exist in Porto Rico. When we give the right to vote, I think we ought now to hedge it about with many qualifications as to age, as to sex, as to some interest in the Territorial government, such as a property qualification or the like. Such requirements are not permanent. Congress can amend at any time. I do not think we ought to extend woman suffrage to Porto Rico, and still, by the language of this bill, it will permit every woman of a given age, placed at above 21 years, to vote, unless there is some inhibition in the general act of 1900—I do not now recall—under which the government was first framed under an act of Congress after we acquired the islands under the treaty of Paris at the close of the Spanish-American War.

I do not think it would be a wise provision to permit this general right of suffrage. There are some States of the Union, Mr. President, in which a property qualification is one of the conditions under which male citizens can vote. There are some States of the Union where an educational test, the ability to read and correctly understand and interpret some section of the Constitution propounded to him by the election officials, is one of the requirements, or that he should pay taxes on a given amount of property, or some other qualification.

If that is true, it ought to be at least transplanted with some qualification to the Porto Rican. I see no objection to that,

But I think further we ought to provide these other qualifications, and before I feel disposed to support a bill of this character I should like that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey be adopted, because I do not think Porto Rico is just yet at all prepared for woman suffrage. The status of women in Porto Rico is entirely different from the status of women in the United States or any of the 48 States of the Union.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amend-

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any tax exemption in Porto Rico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think there is any. Mr. JONES. So if a person owns $10 worth of property he will have to pay some taxes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I concur in a portion of what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Sherman] has just said as to the effect of this amendment. I think if the amendment is adopted in its present form, women in Porto Rico would have the right to vote. I have no objection to that myself. I think it a meritorious feature of the amendment, with the other qualifications and conditions which are in effect. With this proviso, however, the Legislature of Porto Rico would have a right under this amendment to limit the franchise to male citizens of the United States 21 years of age, who come within one or the other of the various classes described in the amendment. This amendment, making the classes which are described in it, is not the grant of a privilege or the reservation of a right, as it has been apparently assumed in some portions of the debate. On the other hand, it is a limitation, and it leaves this condition, that the Legislature of Porto Rico, under the general powers which are granted by this act, can prescribe the qualifications of voters with the condition that they must come within one or the other of these several classes. In other words, you may take the class who can read and write, and the legislature may require in addition to that that they shall also have a property qualification. It may require in addition to that that they should have voted at the election in 1917. If the legislature should so require, it would still be within the terms of this act, because those granted the franchise would come within one of the classes here prescribed. That is all this amendment provides. The fact that the legislature should require additional qualifications would not in any way be inconsistent with the amendment.

The legislative powers of the island of Porto Rico will be vested in a legislature consisting of a senate and a house of representatives-a senate of 19 members, a house of representatives of 39 members-both branches to be elected by the people, and that legislature shall determine the qualifications of voters after the first election. This act is not very specific as to the powers of the legislative assembly. It is quite voluminous in prescribing the parliamentary procedure which shall govern the conduct of business, but practically the only specification of the power of the legislature is contained in section 37 in the most general terms:

SEC. 37. That the legislative authority herein provided shall extend to all matters of a legislative character not locally inapplicable, including power to create, consolidate, and reorganize the municipalities so far as may be necessary, and to provide and repeal laws and ordinances therefor; also the power to alter, amend, modify, or repeal any or all laws and ordinances of every character now in force in Porto Rico or municipality or district thereof in so far as such alteration, amendment, modification, or repeal may be consistent with the provisions of this act.

And the further provision in section 38 that-

The Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico is hereby authorized to enact ws relating to the regulation of the rates, tariffs, and service of public

So that unless the subject matter is prohibited by the terms of this act the legislature of Porto Rico would have the power to legislate in regard to it in so far as it is applicable to the island of Porto Rico. Of course, that would include the franchise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out paragraph 3 as now amended. [Putting the question.] ayes seem to have it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who is not in the Chamber, and for that reason I withhold my vote.

therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not seeing that Senator in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hollis]. Not seeing him in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Lippitt] to the Senator from California [Mr. Phelan] and vote "nay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] the year are 31 and the nays The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Curtis], the Senator from Rhode Island. [Mr. Colt], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling], the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Beckham], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Clark], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCumber], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] are present and paired. The Chair declares the amendment to the amendment agreed to.

The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Martine] in the nature of a substitute for sec-

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not insist upon that amendment, inasmuch as an amendment has been adopted which covers the matter.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not think it does cover the matter. It seems to me that my substitute is a clean-cut proposition, stripped of all of the "a, b, c" nonsense, and just plainly gives to the male citizens of Porto Rico who are citizens of the United States and over 21 years of age the right to vote. I press that amendment most earnestly, and I can not imagine a Democratic Senate, at least, in fact I can not imagine an American Senate voting for the propositions that are encompassed in the measure presented by the Senator from Colorado.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!
The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey in the nature of a substitute for section 35.

Mr. REED. Let the amendment be stated again, Mr. President. Some of us have been attending to duties on committees and could not be here

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary. As a substitute for section 35 it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 35. That qualified electors shall be all males who are 21 years of age and over, and who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is a plain, clean-cut

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question]. The noes seem to have it.
Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask for the yeas and nays,

Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will ask concerning the proviso which was attached to the amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary. There is a proviso at the end of the amendment, which was agreed to, and which reads:

Provided, That at all elections subsequent to the first election herein provided for no one shall be entitled or permitted to register or vote who is not at the time of registration or election a bona fide citizen of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is surplusage in view of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, because he has included the same language in his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proviso, then, will be considered out. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish merely to say a word in explanation of my vote against the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clapp] to strike out clause (c) of the amendment.

Now that that clause has been stricken out, the Legislature of Porto Rico must exclude from the franchise those who are not able to read and write and did not vote at the election of 1917. If that clause had remained in the act, not only those classes but also those who by thrift and industry had accumulated a little property could be given the franchise. Because the striking out of this class is a limitation upon the franchise I voted against the motion. Many good people in that island may have had no chance to learn to read and write.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, on page 6 1 move to strike out lines 4 and 5, which read:

That the right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated.

I move to strike that out for this reason-

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary seems to have a different copy of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am reading from the reprint. I have not the original bill in my hand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What section is it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is the last two lines of section 2.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What page and line?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On page 6 of the print that I have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What line?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The last two lines.

The SECRETARY. It is on page 5, lines 23 and 24, and reads a follows: as follows .

That the right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my reason for moving to strike out those words is this: The effect of the provision would be to prevent the Legislature of Porto Rico from providing for a thoroughgoing workmen's compensation law if they desire to do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber

The VICE PRESIDENT rapped for order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Language of that character is to be found in the constitutions of some of the States, and the result has been that when they have desired to adopt so-called workmen's compensation laws they have had to resort to all sorts of devices to get around the effect of that provision, because the effect of providing that compensation shall be paid automatically for death resulting from injury is to abrogate the action for damages. The tendency in all civilized countries, including our own, is to get rid of the old common-law action for death or injury based upon negligence, and to substitute for it a law which permits the payment of compensation automatically after an accident has occurred.

For the reason that this provision will greatly interfere with the carrying out of that wholesome reform in Porto Rico, I move to strike it out

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have tried to have the corrections made, so that it is possible to know exactly what the qualifications of a voter may be and what power is left in the legislature to prescribe further qualifications. I do not know that I have the amendment before me in such form that I can possibly find my way through the corrections that have been made, in order to determine what has been adopted and what has been rejected; but, as far as I am concerned, I am not willing to leave to the Porto Rico Legislature the authority to

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator realizes, does he not, that the Congress of the United States retains control?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do. I also realize how difficult it is to move Congress in certain directions, and I realize how potential great interests become in controlling legislation in these new governments which we set up.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then I will suggest to the Senator, also, that the governor of the island, who is appointed by the President, has the veto power. Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And if they should override the veto power the matter comes to the President of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize that. But, Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment, if I can have time to do so. taken from the Clerk's desk the copy of the bill, to find the proper place to insert it, and I want an opportunity to offer an amendment which shall take from the legislature any authority to change the qualifications of a voter as fixed by this bill or to add any new qualifications to those which we establish for the Porto Rico electorate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would suggest to the Senator that there are a number of things that the Legislature of Porto Rico properly should do. For instance, it was said here on the floor of the Senate a short time ago that there is nothing in this about whether a criminal should be allowed to vote or not, and surely the Porto Rican Legislature should have the right to determine such qualifications as that. Then I hope the Senator will bear in mind that the Legislature of Porto Rico heretofore has exercised the right of extending the franchise instead of limiting it. It has been their claim and their contention that-

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to show any discourtesy to the Senator, but I am unable to examine this bill and listen

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not wish to delay the Senate in the consideration of this bill, and yet I want to be sure about its provisions. I guess I had better ask for a roll call to get a little time

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President— Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to do that. Mr. SHAFROTH. I will not interrupt the Senator further. Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to see this bill passed. I should like to correct this amendment so that I will know its provisions

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after a pause). Mr. President, can we not proceed with the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; you can. Do you want to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Chair has ordered the third reading of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I will call for a quorum, Mr.

President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope the Senator will not do that. Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will not do it if I can have time to look at this amendment.

Mr. FALL. I make the point of no querum.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator had been in the Senate, he would have heard the amendment.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was in the Senate.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Part of the time.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was in the Senate all of the time.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Go ahead and fix it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I looked at the Senator's chair and did not see him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have been upon the floor of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think we are about to finish up this bill now, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it takes much longer, I shall have to call up the unfinished business.

Mr. JAMES. It will be passed directly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, after the word "qualifications," in line 4 of section 35, I offer the amendment which I

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course it will be necessary to reconsider the vote whereby this amendment was adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I move to reconsider the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. FALL. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.
The yeas and nays were not ordered.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The ayes have it, and the vote is reconsidered. Now the Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The Secretary. At the end of line 4, after the word "qualifications," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "which shall not hereafter be altered by the Legislature of Porto Rico without the consent of Congress

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. FALL. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendment is still open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not unless the vote is again reconsidered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the haste of formulating this amendment, which was prepared at the Clerk's desk, three words were omitted which, I believe, are necessary in order to carry out the purpose for which the amendment was offered. Without these words the amendment as adopted fails to accomplish the purpose for which it was offered. Therefore, I want to offer to further amend it, and, if it is necessary, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which this amendment was agreed to be

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered.

I object.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, Mr. President, I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before voting on that question I should like to know what the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to add, LA FOLLETTE. I propose to add, after the word "qualifications" in the amendment which was adopted, the words "and no others."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the effect?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The effect of it would be to prevent the legislature from imposing further qualifications aside from those fixed by the provisions which we have adopted and such as Congress hereafter consents to.

The motion is debatable, I under-Mr. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offered the previous amendment, but I find on an examination with reference to the context of the whole paragraph that it will not accomplish the purpose for which it was offered without the addition of these three words.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not going to object to a reconsideration of the vote, but I intend to have something to say about the amendment itself when it is presented.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it is going to lead to a debate, I must insist on the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was an objection to a reconsideration, so the question is on reconsidering the vote whereby the amendment as amended was adopted. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let us have a division. Mr. FALL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

conference to so change and modify the amendment as to carry out the intention and purpose of the Senate in adopting the amendment, I will not offer to amend it.

Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that other Senators here probably have just as sincere convictions upon this matter as lie has, and should the chairman of the committee agree to the proposition, which I consider rather a remarkable one myself, as a member of the committee I will say the bill will not pass at the present time. So there will be nothing gained by the acceptance by the chairman of the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator from New Mexico object to unanimous consent to take a vote on the amendment now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut is demanding the regular order, and at the request of the Senator from North Carolina the unfinished business is before the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the action of the House upon the conference report on Senate bill 703 be laid before the Senate. I wish to say to the Senator from North Carolina if it takes 10 minutes I will not ask to proceed with its consideration. think there will be no objection at all to concurring in the action of the House, and we can dispose of it at once.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the bill, I inquire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The vocational educational bill.
Mr. OVERMAN. It is the conference report?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the conference report. The House has acted upon the conference report

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its present consideration, but I have not had time to read the report; and if the report is laid before the Senate I will ask the Senator to make a statement as to what the changes are.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can do that in two minutes. yielded only two propositions, and those not substantial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator agrees as he has stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we can not pass it in 10 minutes, if there is any debate, I will ask leave to withdraw it.
Mr. POINDEXTER. I object, Mr. President.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9533) to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes. I hope this motion will be adopted, because it is evident we can dispose of the bill in probably 15 or 20 minutes

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that Senators have stated to me that the Porto Rican bill will take some time, and they are not going to let it pass without debate. Therefore I hope the Senate will vote down the motion of the Senator from

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I now ask that the Presiding Officer lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives upon the conference report on Senate bill 703, which was a concurrence in the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the conference report on Senate bill 703 be now laid before the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator having the measure in charge, which is now the unfinished business—the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman]—as we have been proceeding heretofore by taking up one bill and talking about it a little while, then setting it aside and taking up another bill, and all that sort of thing, that I shall hereafter, if I am present, object to unanimous consent to the laying aside of the unfinished business for the consideration of anything except conference reports, appropriation bills, and the revenue

Mr. OVERMAN. The unfinished business has only been laid aside once, and every Senator realized that that was all right, I that we yielded. The House yielded on the other matters.

as it was to conclude the consideration of the Porto Rican bill. the understanding being that on the present occasion it would only take three or four minutes to dispose of it; but after the debate proceeded it was realized that the consideration of that bill would take up so much time that it was impossible to conclude its consideration, and therefore I made the motion which I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]? The Chair hears none, and lays the conference report referred to before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for coopera-tion with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will state to Senators that the only amendments of any importance are those which I have mentioned. First, we extend the date one year In our original bill we expected to get ready to operate in 1916-17. Now, we have extended it to begin in 1917-18. In the bill as it passed the Senate we provided a vocational board to be in charge of the work, consisting of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. The House rejected all Cabinet officers, and provided for a board of five men, one representing manufacturing, one representing commerce, one representing agriculture, one representing labor, and I do not know who the fifth member was, but one representing something else.

Mr. SMOOT. All to be appointed by the President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All to be appointed by the President. We adjusted that difference between us by retaining the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and making the Commissioner of Education a member of the board. Under our original bill he was not a member of the board, but was the executive officer. We abandoned him as an executive officer, and put him on the board. Then we added three additional members, to be named by the President, one of whom should be a representative of manufacturing and commerce, one a representative of agriculture, and one a representative of labor. We have merged the two ideas into one.

Mr. SMOOT. The board will consist of seven members, instead of five, as the Senate bill provided?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. We also had a provision in the Senate bill that named four men, to be selected by the board, to be directors—one the general director of vocational education at a salary of $7,500, one a specialist in agriculture, one a specialist in trades and mechanical arts, one a specialist in commerce, and one a specialist in domestic science or commerce. We named the specialists and fixed their salaries. We gave that up; but left the broad power in this board to determine whether specialists were needed, and, if so, to fix their salaries. We put that provision as to salaries in the Senate bill largely because we wanted to be sure that they would be high-class men. After conference with the House conferees we concluded that we should leave the board unrestricted. for it might be that they would want a man who would require even a higher salary than the highest we had named. We felt that the board ought to put at the head of this work the very ablest man who could be found in the United States who would take charge of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, under the provisions of the conference report there would be no limit at all placed upon the wage of any of the employees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. None at all, except that the board is given $200,000 for its own use to promote the organization and the development of the work. The salaries of the members of the board, however, are only $5,000 each.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that perhaps that will be satisfactory for the first year; but in the next appropriation bill providing the funds for carrying out the provisions of the bill I hope the Senator will agree with us that each officer shall be specifically provided for and his salary fixed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah knows that that is one of the theories that I have always urged and pressed. The original bill as prepared by our joint committee did not contain the paragraph naming the salaries of these five experts.

I wrote that myself, and asked the Senate to adopt it, but the House declined to adopt it. We felt that at least for the first year we could leave it to the board, broadly organized as it is, to start the work without restriction. That is practically all

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a concurrent resolution in connection with this matter, which the House of Representatives has passed. We use the word "name" at one place in the House conference report, where we meant to convey the meaning covered by the resolution; and after the adoption of the conference report the House passed the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 75.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill S. 703, entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education, to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries, to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects, and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure," the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the word "name" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "designate or create," in the third line of the second paragraph of section 5, as the same appears in the conference report on said bill and amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The word "name" applies to authority to the governor, pending the action of the legislature, to name a board. This language, it was desired, should be uni-

OFFENSES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand, Mr. President, the unfinished business is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8148) to define and punish espionage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. The pending amendment is one which was offered by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Owen], on page 10, line 9, to strike out the word "defeat" and to insert the word "influence"; and, in line 10, to strike out the words "in relation to such dispute or controversy" and to insert the words "or any branch thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Oklahoma ought to be present when that amendment is acted upon. I hope no action will be taken on the amendment until he comes in. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question we were considering yesterday was an amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. He withdrew the amendment, however, and offered another amendment. If he will introduce that now, I think this would be the proper time to consider and dispose of it. We had quite a debate yesterday on the subject.

Mr. OWEN entered the Chamber.
Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am quite willing that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma be now taken up.

Mr. OWEN. It will take only a moment. On page 10, I suggested an amendment in line 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has just been stated, but, in the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma, it was, by unanimous consent, laid aside.

The purpose of the amendment which I pro-Mr. OWEN. posed was to broaden the matter so as to cover an untrue statement orally or in writing under oath which had a view or intent to influence any measure of or action by the Government of the United States or any branch thereof. The amendment makes it broad. We ought not, I think, to permit false statements in writing to be made to influence the Government of the United The Senate will doubtless remember in the Lusitania case that there was a man who made a false affidavit with regard to munitions of war, arms, and cannon on the Lusitania. It was on the basis of that false statement that Germany is supposed to have sunk the Lusitania. A similar affidavit might be made by a United States citizen that would lead to most mischi vous consequences. The language ought, therefore, to be made as broad as possible. That is all I wish to suggest. I think it is obvious that that ought to be the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment

The Secretary. On page 10, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the word "defeat" and to insert the word "influence," and in line 10 to strike out the words "in relation to such dispute or controversy" and to insert the words "or any branch thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are the two amendments to be considered together?

Mr. OWEN. I ask that they may be considered as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, at this point I should like to inquire what was done, if anything, with the words "under oath," in line 2, on page 10? Were they left in the bill? I know there was some discussion on the point last evening, and I thought at one time that they had been stricken out.

Mr. OVERMAN. They were left in the bill, because it was stated that the objection was covered in another section.

chapter was not amended at all.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it occurs to me that statements injurious to the Government and having a tendency to hinder or injure the Government in its operations can as well be made without being made under oath as if they were made under oath. I hardly see why it should be required that statements of this kind, in order that the party uttering them should be punished, should be required to be made under oath. statements aimed at are those intended "to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government," which statements in order to be injurious need not be under oath.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator's theory is worked out practically, we will be obliged to enforce it on our Mexican border, where statements are made not only derogatory to the Government, but truthful; and, if so made, and the Government believe them to be untrue, the person uttering them must be apprehended under that very extraordinary power.

Mr. STERLING. I would say, Mr. President, that the object of this provision is to punish such statements as will tend "to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government." I will say further to the Senator from Michigan that I think such statements are more often made not under oath than under oath; and those are the very statements that do influence the conduct of a foreign Government to the detriment of the Government of the United States. They are not statements made under oath.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator's suggestion, if adopted, would make the provision too broad. Statements made in a simple conversation or idle talk might render a man liable to indictment. This provision is intended to cover cases where a man swears absolutely to some fact rather than to include the case of a man who may casually talk about a matter. I think to do that and to say that we will indict that man on the ground that his remarks might tend to influence a foreign Government would be going a little too far.

Mr. STERLING. But, Mr. President, the statute sought to be enacted here requires that he shall have "knowledge or reason to believe" that the statement will "influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government." It does not mean mere casual statements but statements made with a deliberate purpose and with a knowledge or belief that they will influence the conduct of a foreign Government.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state it.

Mr. WORKS. I was not here when this bill was under discussion yesterday, and I should like to know whether there is some particular chapter that is before the Senate now, or whether the bill is before the Senate generally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The entire substitute is before - the Senate; the whole matter is before the Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to address myself for just a few moments to chapter one, which, I think, calls for serious consideration. This is a time when the public mind is excited and inflamed and we are very likely to go too far in legisla-tion of this kind. It is a time when, I think, we should be cautious, for we are likely to take away some of the liberties and privileges of American citizens by legislation of this kind that I think ought not to be trespassed upon, and I want to call attention to the broad provisions of chapter 1. It provides in the beginning, in section 1:

SECTION 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled, approaches, goes upon, or enters, files over—

And so forth.

Now, there is no limitation upon that, except that he shall not be "lawfully entitled" to the information. I should like to know-and perhaps the acting chairman of the committee can tell me-who is regarded under that section as being lawfully entitled to secure information about the affairs of government, including its defenses. I think a subsequent section of the act tends to construe that particular provision, that is very loose in its terms, for in section 6 it is provided:

Sec. 6. The President of the United States shall have power to designate any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a) of section 1 hereof as a prohibited place for the purposes of this chapter, on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudical to the national defense; he shall further have the power, on the aforesaid ground, to designate any matter, thing, or information belonging to the Government, or contained in the records or files of any of the executive departments, or of other Government offices, as information relating to the national defense, to which no person—

Now, mark the language-

(other than officers and employees of the United States duly authorized) shall be lawfully entitled within the meaning of this chapter.

Under those two provisions of the section no American citizen would have the right to make inquiry or seek informaton as to the condition of the defenses of the Government. It seems to me that is going a long way.

It will be noticed, Mr. President, that it is not required, in order to bring a citizen within the provisions of this act, that he should be seeking this information for any improper purpose or with any ulterior motive. The mere fact of a citizen of the United States seeking the information, even for the most innocent purposes, makes him a criminal under the provisions of this proposed substitute. This will be noticed with respect to all of the provisions contained in section 1.

As I have said, the first clause of the section that I have already read applies simply to obtaining information respecting the national defense, and further along, where there are additional acts prohibited, the clause is "contrary to the provisions of this chapter," and then there is the provision I have already read, which shows, I think, quite clearly that the President may on his own motion designate any place in the United States that he thinks the people of this country ought not to know about, and when he designates it, if any citizen undertakes to obtain any information with respect to it he becomes a criminal,

Of course, if this was intended to prohibit the securing of information for any improper purpose-for example, for the purpose of disclosing it to some foreign nation or to use it in any improper way-I should have no objection to it, and I think it would be entirely proper; but certainly, to my mind, it is going altogether too far to deny any American citizen the right to seek information for innocent purposes with respect to any portion of the Government and its condition.

I am only now briefly calling attention to objections which I think are pertinent to this particular chapter and to the particular section to which I have referred.

OFFENSES AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8148) to define and punish espionage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I understand, this measure, consisting of a series of bills, is now before the Senate. It gets before the Senate and then disappears so quickly that I am never certain just what is under consideration. I have no great objection to any of the bills which have been incorporated in the pending measure save one. I think that the amendment which I proposed yesterday to certain of them, or an amendment of that general character, ought to be adopted; but my chief objection is to chapter 1, concerning which the Senator from California [Mr. Works] has just submitted some very pertinent observations. I defer offering the amendment which I have to propose to subsequent chapters, and which relates to the use by the President of the Army and Navy for the enforcement of our laws, until a later time, but, in order that those Senators who are here may be apprised of the character of the amendment I shall offer, I ought to read it, having changed its phrase-ology somewhat as compared with the amendment I offered yesterday. I intend to offer finally to section 8 of chapter 9, page 24, the following addition:

Provided, That without the further authority of Congress such armed force shall not be used beyond the territorial limits of the United States to commit an act of war against a nation with which the United States is then at peace.

I mention the subject now, for I believe that it well deserves some thought on the part of the Senate; and I hope that before we reach that part of the bill those who think that we ought not to abdicate and surrender the power of Congress in this regard to the Chief Executive will give the matter attention. I call now to the minds of Senators chapter 1.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.
Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in connection with the proposed amendment I simply want to suggest to the Senator—I am in harmony with the purpose and spirit of his position—if cases ought not to be excepted from it where the act occurred in consequence of some act within our territorial limits that necessarily resulted in pursuit. I will not press it now. I just make the suggestion for later consideration; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestion made is worthy of consideration. Possibly I have not phrased it as carefully as it should be phrased, but it expresses my general idea with regard to the property of the property to the use of the Army and the Navy in time of peace by the President.

Mr. President, we have just been manifesting great solicitude for the citizens of Porto Rico. I think that the interest which the Senate has indicated in preserving to the citizens of that island some of the rights and privileges of people of free countries is very praiseworthy, and I sincerely hope that, as the Senate comes to examine chapter 1 of this bill, its Members will feel the same concern with regard to the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States residing in continental North America.

I want it clearly understood that I am not approaching an analysis of this question from the standpoint of an extreme I believe in adequate preparation against invasion. believe in an army and a navy that will and can protect the shores of this country from every enemy in the world.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask at what particular point that amendment goes in?

Mr. CUMMINS. The one that I mentioned a few minutes ago?

Mr. BORAH. The one that the Senator just read.
Mr. CUMMINS. It is added to section 8, on page 24.
Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I think that in this connection it ought to be borne in mind that the provisions of chapter 1 are not confined to time of war at all, but extend to a time of peace.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is one of the first things that I intended to say when I reached that part of my address.

I do not want to be accused of any lukewarmness in the na-

I do not want to be accused of any lukewarmness in the national defense, although I may differ from some of my associates with respect to the measure of defense necessary to successfully protect this country against inroads or aggressions from abroad. I desire it to be also understood that in time of war I have no desire to restrict the power of the Commander in Chief of our Army and our Navy. I am quite willing that in the territory in which martial law is declared the civil rights of citizens shall, for the time, be subordinate; but I am unwilling that, in time of reace, the privilege and time of peace, the privileges and safeguards of the people of the United States which have been regarded through all the ages as necessary to the protection of the people in a free country shall be repealed or withdrawn. I am unwilling that a great number of new and strange offenses shall be created which will draw within themselves a large part of the population of a country which indulges in free speech and free thought, when not necessary to protect either the territory or the honor of the Republic.

Even in time of war the district which would probably be covered by martial law is small in proportion to that part which will be amenable to the civil laws, and in which the ordinary business of American citizens will be carried on, I hope, in the ordinary way. I intend to analyze this chapter a little more fully than did the Senator from California. If I believed that it was necessary to create a proper national defense, to pass laws of this sort, I would rather go unprepared into the conflict than to subject the people of this country to the dangers, the menace, contained in such legislation.

Let us see. I am confining myself now to chapter 1, and I direct your attention to section 1 of chapter 1. There are two things to be remembered in considering it. First, as stated by the Senator from California [Mr. Works], it governs us in peace as well as in war. Now, that is not true of the entire There are some paragraphs of the chapter which are applicable only in time of war; but this particular section of the chapter, section 1, would be in force in times of the pro-

Second—and I hope those who are here will remember that what I am now saying applies to every provision of section 1 it is not required to be shown that the offender intended either to injure his own country in any degree, or that he intended to aid or abet another country in any degree, whether that other country at the time is at peace or in war.

With those two thoughts or bases in mind, I begin to read section 1:

That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense—

My first inquiry is this: What is the national defense? Those words are not defined; they are in no wise qualified or restricted; and the first question that must be answered in determining whether or not a citizen is guilty of the offense of this paragraph is, Is he attempting to obtain information respecting the national defense?

We have had a good deal of discussion in recent months about the national defense, and I should like to know—I am not asking for an answer just at this moment—the views of Senators with regard to the meaning of that term. Is it confined to the Army and the Navy? Evidently not, for it is universally agreed that it extends to all manufactories engaged in producing arms and munitions of war. But is it confined to manufactories engaged in producing the things that are directly used in war, or is it to be extended to every national energy which makes up an adequate and effective national defense?

I have heard it applied, and so have you, to agriculture. It is said that it is necessary to make stable, permanent, and general the development of our fields in order that in time of war our armies may be successfully sustained, or our citizens adequately fed. I have heard it applied to schools, because it is alleged that we can not create an adequate national defense unless we have cultivated the heart and the mind. I do not believe it will be asserted here that the words "national defense" do extend to these things, but no one can tell to what they extend. They may mean, I suppose, anything that is necessary in order successfully to defend ourselves against an enemy or successfully to attack an enemy, if attack is the approved method of defense at any given time. I should think that it would include everything from the mines and the forests which ultimately passes into the structures or the arms that are used in war, no matter whether they are used immediately in battle, or whether they are used in general connection with the Army or the Navy.

I ask Senators to observe, second, that this information respecting the national defense is forbidden to every person not lawfully entitled to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I think a very erroneous idea is to be gathered from the statement of the Senator and from the comments that he has been making about this matter. It is not necessary, in my estimation, closely to define what is meant by "national defense" here; and the bill does not make criminal, as might seem to be gathered from the remarks of the Senator, the gathering of information about the national defense. The remark concerning national defense is in the nature of inducement. There are certain acts denounced by the bill, namely

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not reached that part of my argument yet, but I will approach it in a moment.

Mr. WALSH. But the point I was making was that it was to be gathered from the remarks of the Senator that the bill made criminal the gathering of information concerning the national defense.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that was one of the elements of The person must be endeavoring to obtain inthe crime. formation respecting the national defense; and when you have proved that the person who is arraigned or under charge has obtained information respecting the national defense, you have proved the first thing necessary to be established in order to constitute the crime.

Mr. WORKS, Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa

yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California. Mr. WORKS. It seems to me that the only other element necessary to constitute the crime under this section is that he should not be lawfully entitled to that information. According to my construction of this and another section of the bill, as I suggested a while ago, nobody would be lawfully entitled to any information relating to the national defense except the officers having that matter directly in charge. If that be so, no American citizen has the right to inquire at all into the national defense of the country, and therefore no right or authority to investigate or to inquire into the conduct of the officers who have that matter in charge.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just about to pass on to the subject mentioned by the Senator from California.

Mr. WALSH. I was merely desirous of remarking that it occurs to me that the thing is turned around. When the prosecuting attorney goes to make a case ordinarily, he proves the act first, and the intent afterwards. The act is defined here, The national-defense business refers simply to the intent with which the act is done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not trying to arrange the order of the testimony that would be brought in upon the trial of one charged with a crime under this paragraph. I am simply endeavoring to state the elements of the crime, and who would be subjected to the penalty of the law if its provisions were carried out.

I resume where I was interrupted.

The next inquiry, after ascertaining whether the information is sought respecting the national defense, is, Was the information sought by one lawfully entitled to it? Now, I restate the inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. Works]. Who is lawfully entitled to information respecting the national defense? We have no statute prescribing who is entitled to such information. There is no common law determining who is entitled to such information, and I do not know whether all the officers of the Army would be entitled to it, or the officers of the Navy. I do not know whether anybody but the Commander in Chief would be entitled to it. I fancy that in time of war, under some circumstances, no one but the commanding officer is entitled to information that might imperil the force under his command if it were to be disclosed.

Whoever drew those words or whoever is responsible for those words, as it seems to me, does not understand American liberty at all, and has no sympathy with our institutions. He is imagining that we have returned to a time when the citizens of the country are to be kept in absolute ignorance of all public matters pertaining to the national defense. I am not authorized, of course, to say what was in the mind of the draftsman of this bill. It came from the office of the Attorney General. The Judiciary Committee had very little to do with it. I do not mean by that to disparage the action of the Judiciary Committee; for if a majority of the Judiciary Committee had really considered this bill from the usual standpoint, if it had emanated from a member of the Judiciary Committee or any Member of the Senate, and the committee had maturely and intelligently reflected upon it, its action would have great weight with me, and I have no doubt would have equal weight with all the Members of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President— Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Now, I do not mean to say that it does not express the conviction of the members of the Judiciary Committee who joined in the report. I assume that it does; but what I do mean to say is that it is not the product of any Member of the Senate, and was received by the Judiciary Committee with the authority passing with it that we all recognize in so learned and so influential a department of the Government as the Department of Justice.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Iowa did not attend our meetings. If he had, he would have found that this bill, of all bills, was maturely considered. It was more maturely considered than any other bill we had before us. He also knows that this is a substitute for the bill sent down by the Attorney General. It has been amended in many particulars, and when it is said that this bill was not considered I have to say to the Senator that it was considered more than any other bill.

We had the benefit of the Senator's great ability and advice in regard to some of these bills. I am sorry he was not there when this one was considered; but if he had attended the meetings he would have found that we considered this particular bill for nearly a week.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not say that it was not considered. I said it was not considered in the way it would have been if it had emanated from another source, namely, a legislative instead of an executive source. I do not believe in that practice, and everybody knows that. I have repeated it so often that my opinion gains no weight by repeating it again.

I was present when this bill was considered originally, and, as recall, the only material amendment was one made because I objected to a part of the bill, and with all deference to the members of the committee the amendment seems to me to make it worse than it was originally. But however that may be, to me it is simply inconceivable that the Judiciary Committee, free from any influence of an executive character, and free from the fear which grows out of the approaching war, would report a bill of this character, for I have already said, and I challenge an answer to it when the time comes, that you can not describe the national defense so that any citizen can tell whether, when he is trying to secure information, he is beginning the commission of a crime or not. You can not tell who is lawfully entitled to information concerning the national defense. We have neither custom nor statute which will inform the citizens of the country upon that subject. I can see no reason why it could not be held that all the citizens of the country, Members of Congress as well as those in private life, were not lawfully entitled to information concerning the national defense, and I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he is entitled to information concerning the national defense, where did he get the authority? Much less would any private citizen be entitled to information concerning the national defense.

Bearing these things in mind, I pass on to a further part of this paragraph, and I am going over it paragraph by paragraph; and if it were not for the deep respect which I feel for every member of the Judiciary Committee I should characterize this part of the bill as monstrous.

Mr. WORKS. Before the Senator leaves that subject, I understand the Senator to say that no private citizen has any lawful right to obtain information of this kind. Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not mean it in that sense. What meant is that no private citizen can trace his title to information concerning the national defense to any statute or to any custom that has the force of law. I believe that every private citizen has a right to information concerning the national defense, but I do not know how a court would construe that language.

Mr. WORKS. That is precisely what I wanted to suggest to the Senator. The serious objection that I make to this bill in that respect is that the object and purpose of it is to deny to the American citizen the right to make any inquiry or to get any information respecting the national defense.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were construing the words that I have been discussing I would say the idea is that the authority on the part of anyone to receive information concerning the national defense must come from the President of the United States, the commander of our armed forces. I proceed:

That whoever, (a) for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled, ap-goes upon, or enters, flies over, or induces or aids another to approach, go upon, enter, or fly over any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense—

Again, we have a description which is so vague and uncertain that no citizen ought to be subjected to a criminal prosecution because he was unable to determine what place is connected with the national defense. I proceed-or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored under any contract or agreement with the United States, or with any person on behalf of the United States, or otherwise on behalf of the United States.

I pause there. The Government arsenals and dockyards and ships and forts are fairly definite. They belong to the Government; and I suppose if the President wants to exclude every person from their limits he has a right to do it, at least I will not quarrel with that authority on his part. But a large part of our armament is constructed under contract with various companies. We are building battleships now under contract in a private yard, and if a citizen were to approach a private shipyard at Newport News or at Fore River in order to secure information respecting a ship being built in such a yard, no matter how innocent he might be in his intent, no matter whether he intends to use the information for any purpose that could be prejudicial to our country, he becomes a criminal.

I venture to say, and I will prove it before I get through, if this chapter had been the law for the last 10 years one-half of the intelligent people of the United States could have been sent to the penitentiary for varying periods, from 3 to 30 years. I myself have violated the provisions of this proposed statute during the last two years scores of times, and I think the Senator from North Carolina has been equally guilty, and I think it is greatly to his credit that he has been guilty of doing the things that are forbidden by this chapter.

Remember now, it is any approach to any manufactory in which anything is being manufactured for the Government or made for the Government. A man who approached the Bethle-hem Steel Works or the Midvale Steel Works or the United States Steel Corporation works, in some of its plants, I assume, in order to get information, without regard to the purpose for which he intended to use it, would at once become a violator of

I am not asserting that this administration would use the law to vex the good citizens of the United States, but I am not willing to give any officer the power when occasion may seem to require it to subject the people of the country to any such penalties as are here prescribed, or to turn innocence into crime in a way that shocks the moral sense of every man who fairly grasps and comprehends what we are here attempting to do.

But I have not yet reached the climax of this particular para-We have now seen that if anyone approaches any of these things, forts, docks, arsenals, boats, yards, railroads or other property over which the United States is said to exercise an exclusive control, if he approaches any manufactory or yard where something is being made for the Government, he becomes at once subject to the operation of this statute.

But as hard and as unnecessary as any such provisions may be, that is not the worst of it. We have attempted to describe here in a legislative way the prohibition, and there is a little something to guide the citizen in his activites. But now have the concluding clause:

Or any prohibited place within the meaning of section 6 of this chapter.

That is, whoever approaches for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense any place prohibited, or that may be prohibited, under the provisions of section 6 of this chapter becomes a criminal and may be prosecuted. Let us see what section 6 is. Section 6 begins in this way:

The President of the United States shall have power to designate any

In time of peace, now; not of war. We may be pursuing our way in all the quietude that has characterized us for the last 30 or 40 years, yet it is declared that-

The President of the United States shall have power to designate any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a) of section 1 hereof as a prohibited place for the purposes of this chapter, on the ground—

Now, mark you how he is absolutely unlimited in his selec-on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudicial to the national defense; he shall further have the power, on the aforesaid ground, to designate any matter, thing, or information belonging to the Government, or contained in the records or files of any of the executive departments, or of other Government offices, as information relating to the national defense, to which no person (other than officers and employees of the United States duly authorized)—

They must not only be officers of the United States but they must be duly authorized in addition-shall be lawfully entitled within the meaning of this chapter.

I know very well it was not intended by the person who drew the bill, but under that provision the President of the United States could say that what transpires in this Chamber shall not be made public if it concerns the national defense. He can padlock the lips of every man in America respecting the national defense.

It is hard for me to be temperate when I am discussing a provision of that sort. Of course, there is no man who values the privileges of the American citizen more than the Senator from North Carolina, and I am sure that he is now thinking to himself that no President would ever execute the law in this That may be so; but all our laws, or a great many of them, are intended to prevent the abuse of power, to prevent a man without conscience and a man without respect for such institutions as ours to override the rights of a citizen. I shall look with great interest to the answer of my friend from North Carolina when he comes to explain the extent of the President's power in designating any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a) on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudicial to the national defense, and I shall look forward with keen curiosity to his exposition of these

He shall further have the power, on the aforesaid ground, to designate any matter, thing, or information belonging to the Government, or contained in the records or files of any of the executive departments or of other Government offices, as information relating to the national defense, to which no person (other than officers and employees of the United States duly authorized) shall be lawfully entitled within the meaning of this chapter.

Mr. President, I have now finished my comment upon para-It is an extraordinary proposal. If the Senate can persuade itself that it is necessary to enact such legislation as that in order, I assume, to prevent some information which ought to be confidential and confined to our own country from creeping abroad in times of peace, then I shall conclude that it has lost its regard for the liberties of citizens which have been won not only upon many a hard-fought battle field but won in many a contest in the Senate of the United States.

I pass now to paragraph (b) of the chapter-or (b) Whoever, for the purpose aforesaid-

Now, what is the purpose aforesaid? The purpose aforesaid is to obtain information respecting the national defense. That is the entire purpose. The acquisition of information concerning the national defense-another to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, document, writing, or note of anything connected with the national

I wonder if Senators will pause long enough in these busy hours to analyze that paragraph and attempt to apply it to the things to which by its very terms it is applicable. It applies to anyone desiring any information concerning the national defense. We have already, I think, apprehended some of the difficulties that are in our way in determining what the national defense is-and without lawful authority-

Again, I ask, who has lawful authority to make a copy of any of the things which I have mentioned and to which I shall again direct your attention-copy, take, make, or obtain any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, document, writing—

I pause there. Any writing connected with the defense. You attempt to make it criminal for any man in this country without some lawful authority, the character of which I do not know and which you can not define, to make a copy of any writing connected with the national defense, or any "document.

Mr. President, I said a few moments ago that if this law had been enforced for the last two years more than half the intelligent reading people of the United States would have been in the penitentiary if the law had been put into execution against them. How many of our people have without lawful authority, or such authority as is contemplated here, copied some writing connected with the national defense? We have all done it there over and over again. I know that was not in the mind of the person who drew this bill, and I am sure it was not the intent of the members of the Judiciary Committee, but the difficulty is that in endeavoring to reach one man who is guilty you have drawn within the operation of the law thousands of men who are not guilty of any moral offense, and you can not convert these liberties of the people of this country concerning their own affairs into crimes by merely reciting these offenses in a statute.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Kirby in the chair). Do the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.
Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator believe we ought to have any legislation in reference to the subjects referred to in this bill, or is he utterly opposed to any legislation bearing on these matters

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think there are some sub-

Mr. NELSON. And if he is—
Mr. CUMMINS. Now, wait until I answer your question.
Mr. NELSON. Yes; answer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not opposed to legislation on these

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator suggest something better than this?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. No one can suggest anything worse; and I am now speaking of chapter 1, of course. am not speaking of the 10, 11, or 12 pages which have been de-nominated as chapters 2, 3, 4, and so on. I am speaking of chapter 1.

It is not an answer, Mr. President, to what I have said for the Senator from Minnesota to ask me whether I can present something better. Impulsively I answered him that any substitute for this chapter would be better. I did not mean any disparagement by that statement, but I invite the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from North Carolina, when the time comes, to reply to what I am saying with regard to the scope and the operation of these paragraphs. I am as anxious as either of them can be to prevent the revelation, if you please, in a time of war to an enemy or to a foreign country of things that are connected with the movements of our Army and our But I am not willing in order to bring about that state of efficiency, if it be a state of efficiency, to close the mouths of the hundred million of American people upon all subjects at all times relating to the national defense. I think that if we must allow this one man, however unfortunate it may be, to go unpunished in order that these millions may preserve the liberties which they have acquired through long and arduous labors, we had better allow the one man to go unpunished. But I see no reason for permitting that. It is not hard, I am sure, to prescribe the terms of a statute which will punish any man who attempts to reveal to an enemy or even to a foreign country or who gathers information for the purpose of revealing to an enemy or a foreign country information that ought to be confined to American shores. But it is not necessary to spread a net of this kind in order to catch a fish of that kind.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President— Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator. Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to how utterly futile it would be to put in clauses requiring the information to be given to a foreign country. What we suffered from during the Civil War more than anything else was the fact that our newspapers contained full information as to the number of troops, their location, the movement of the troops, and every-thing. The newspapers did not do it with an evil intent. They did it for the purpose of selling their newspapers, getting a market for purveying the news to the American people, and yet it was one of the greatest evils that we had to contend with during the Civil War.

Now, if the Senator will allow me, I want to add one further word to what he said a moment ago. He said the President may designate some other place. Let me point out what that means. Suppose in an actual war we had to establish a new submarine base somewhere immediately, a new point. It may be necessary for the President to designate it. We need in this new method of warfare new places to store our supplies for our submarine works, and hence it is necessary to give the President some power.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to giving the President some power, and the power that has just been described by the Senator from Minnesota. But it seems utterly impossible for me to so express myself that the Senator from Minnesota will understand that in reaching an instance of that kind it is not necessary to extend the crime to every person who may seek to obtain information concerning the national defense.

My second answer to the statement just made is this: He is thinking of a time of war. I will come to the newspaper paragraph presently. It is a most interesting paragraph, but I have not reached it yet. I am not dealing with newspapers or the harm that they did the country in the Civil War. There are some observations to be made upon that subject. But I remind the Senator from Minnesota that this chapter, in so far as I have been considering it up to this time, is not confined to a time of war. It is just as effective in a time of peace as in war.

The Senator from Minnesota may not have been here in the early part of my analysis during which I said that when war comes, when martial law must supersede civil law, when the Commander in Chief of the Armies and Navies must be the supreme arbiter of the liberties of the citizen, then I have no disposition to limit the power of the Commander in Chief, but I have great objection to giving the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy the absolute disposition of the liberties of the people during times of peace.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be glad to yield. Mr. NELSON. The Senator can readily see if you limit this to an actual state of war how utterly futile it will be. not help referring to a concrete case. Take the case between France and Germany. For years before the present war broke out Germany carried on a system of espionage in France. The whole country was subject to it. They had maps of every bit of the country. They had diagrams and blue prints of all the fortifications. They had even gone so far in Belgium as to build concrete foundations for their big guns. In cases of that kind, Mr. President, I insist that it is necessary to provide against these things before the outbreak of actual war. If you wait until then it may be too late. The countries we are liable to get into war with will long before the war breaks out have carried on a system by which they will have acquired full information as to our fortifications, our shipyards, and all our naval and military appliances, and secured it before the outbreak of

Now, it is to prevent that as much as in reference to what may occur during actual war that it is necessary to legislate. I want to remind the Senator that while there are some expressions perhaps in the bill that may seem a little too drastic, yet I hold that when the safety of the country is at stake the rights of the individual must be subrogated to the great right of maintaining the integrity and welfare of the Nation.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota seems to think that this is necessary for the safety of the United States. not; nor do I think we have a Nation worth saving if this is necessary. If the power that is here sought to be given to the Executive, coupled with these offenses that are for the first time prescribed in American life, are necessary, I doubt whether the Nation could be preserved.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—
Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Allow me to continue for a few moments. When I have finished this thought I shall then be ready to yield. The Senator from Minnesota has disclosed the real purpose of the proposed statute, or the part of it which I have been reading. I assume that it is well known, and generally accepted, that Germany had pretty thorough information regarding France; I assume that it is fairly well accepted that France had pretty thorough information regarding Germany; and that England had pretty fair information regarding both countries, I have an idea that maps of the United States are in all the capitals of Europe. I do not know, but I presume that Europe understands about how many men we have authorized to make up our Army; about how many ships we have authorized. I have been told, although I have no way of verifying it, that all the foreign countries have people here all the time trying to acquire whatever information they can relative to our country and its armament. If the Senator from Minnesota has any idea that we can build around the United States a Chinese wall so high that no information concerning our national defense can creep through it, or fly over it, he is doomed to disappointment.

The United States, in common with all other countries, has grown very close to even those powers which are farthest removed; we are close to them; and if the Senator means to assert that, in order to prevent this information from getting to Germany or Great Britain or France or Japan, I must be prevented from knowing anything about it, I resent the enactment of the statute.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want to carry on a debate with the Senator pending my remarks, though I am glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say one thing I omitted to say before, and that is that I have no doubt to-day-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Iowa declines to yield for an interruption.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, so far as I may properly do so.

Mr. NELSON. What I desire to say and what I neglected to say before was that I have no doubt to-day that all the great powers in Europe have complete information as to our naval and military strength, as to our ships of war, our munition factories, our naval bases, our navy yards, and everything else that pertains to the national defense; they also have maps of our country; so I think that any one of those countries, if they intended to invade this country, would be as well informed as are our own people where to land an army to attack us. It is to pre-vent information being improperly secured that this statute is intended. I admit what the Senator says, that it is utterly impossible to exclude every such attempt, but we certainly ought to do something to protect the Nation against such dangers and such emergencies. That is all for which I am contending.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from Minnesota and myself are in absolute harmony with regard to the general purpose; but the difficulty is that he thinks in order to accomplish that purpose it is necessary to manacle all the people of the United States; that it is necessary to withdraw all the people of the United States from any information respecting the national defense, fearing that some part of it may finally be brought to the attention of the enemy.

You can not make a law, Mr. President, too severe for me aimed at the acquisition of information concerning our Army and Navy and military armament intended to be revealed to an enemy or even intended to be disclosed to a foreign country; I shall make no opposition to any such proposition as that; but when, in order to reach a person who has such an intent, you find it necessary to say to me that I can not know anything about our ships and our armies and our docks and our munition factories and our fields and our forests, all of which are related to the national defense, then you are trampling upon a right that is infinitely more important to be preserved than it is to preserve our secrets from a foreign country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. Mr. OVERMAN. It is whenever you go for the purpose of getting information to which you are not entitled that this bill proposes to punish you. It does not propose to punish generally the American people for the acquisition of information, but it says, whenever an American citizen goes for the purpose—those are the words—of obtaining information to which he is not lawfully entitled, then he is guilty. The Senator from Iowa makes it too general when he says all the people of the United States are forbidden. It is only when they attempt to secure such information for an unlawful purpose that this proposed statute would apply.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is it, Mr. President. The Senator from North Carolina has, with his fine instinct for what is right, really inserted the word that ought to be in this proposed stat-If I desire to secure information for an unlawful purpose, I ought to be punished; but what is an "unlawful purpose" The Senator from North Carolina says that if I attempt to secure information respecting the national defense without lawful authority. But have I lawful authority to acquire information or to approach any of these places in order to secure information respecting the national defense? Assuming now that my only purpose is to make myself a more efficient guardian of the national defense, have I a lawful authority; and if so, where did I get it?

Mr. OVERMAN. What right have you as an American citizen to go upon the premises of an arsenal to obtain the secrets of the Government without lawful authority? I do not think any citizen has such authority, and it shows an unlawful purpose when he does it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.
Mr. OVERMAN. If he goes there for that purpose and obtains the secrets of the Government or of the national de-

Mr. CUMMINS. This provision says nothing about "secrets." Mr. OVERMAN. But that is what it means.

Mr. CUMMINS. That word is not in it. It says whoever, with the purpose of securing information respecting the national defense-not goes upon-for, again using myself as an illustration, they may close the doors against me, I assume, and I could not go upon these sacred governmental inclosures; but this proposed law says whoever, for the purpose of securing information respecting the national defense, approaches any of these places shall be punished. How near must be approach? If I walk down to the banks of the Potomac River in order to see the Mayflower-it is a part of our national defense, I understand

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or to Fortress Monroe.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I may have a great curiosity to know in just what way the Mayflower is being used in order to protect the country against our enemies-if I approach the banks of the Potomac River in order to look upon this triumph of naval architecture, this home of pleasure, I would make myself a criminal. I know the Senator from North Carolina, if he were a prosecuting officer, would not attempt to convict me for that offense; but I, nevertheless, would have committed the offense described in this statute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa

yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah with pleasure

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not want the Senator to yield to

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I yield to the Senator because I know the Senator from Utah will, if there is any merit in this thing, disclose it. So I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not arise particularly for the purpose of disclosing the merits of the proposition, but I wanted to get the view of the Senator from Iowa with reference to a phase of the matter.

The Senator says that if he walked down to see the Mayflower for the purpose of seeing what sort of a ship it was, under this proposed statute he would be guilty of a criminal offense. The Senator would not be guilty of a criminal offense in doing that, even if this proposed statute were passed, because his going down there and seeing the Mayflower would not be forbidden. Therefore he would be lawfully entitled to do so. The phrase "lawfully entitled" means nothing more and nothing less than that the particular information must have been forbidden, not necessarily by an act of Congress; because in dealing with milinecessarily by an act of Congress; because in deating with mintary matters the President has very great power. The President is made, by the Constitution, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and under that authority the President himself, or the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War, discharging part of the duties of the President, as his agent, may make regulations that people shall not go into forts; that they shall not visit battleships under certain circumstances; that they shall not do this, that, or the other in connection with the national defense.

It seems to me that the proper construction of this language is simply that the citizen would have a right to visit these places to seek this information, unless it was of a character that had been forbidden by some regulation of the War Department or order or by some act of Congress. I know there are regulations which do forbid one going into certain fortifications and obtaining certain information; and the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may extend those regulations from time to time. If he does so, a citizen who undertakes to obtain information in violation of those regulations is undertaking to get something to which he is not lawfully entitled; but in the absence of prohibition he is lawfully entitled to such information, and he may go.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a very large part of my objection to these particular paragraphs of this chapter would disappear if the Senator from Utah had written the law and had expressed in the measure the thought which he has just given to the Senate. There would then be some safety remaining, and there would be some privileges left.

If we would undertake now to prescribe the information that the ordinary citizen may lawfully secure concerning our national defense, I would have no difficulty, then, at least in understanding what we might do, or if we were to confine it to time of war and say that the President shall have the authority to prevent the approach of any person to any place that he may designate, I would understand that; but that would be tolerable only in time of war and would not be admitted in time of peace.

That, however, is not the proposed statute.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland] has given a fanciful explanation and a fanciful definition of the words "lawfully entitled." There is nothing in our statutes or in our customs, as I have already remarked more than once, that will enable us to determine to what part of the knowledge concerning our national defense the individual citizen is entitled.

There is another paragraph in the chapter which relates to the power of the President to suppress newspapers, and I think that the remarks of the Senator from Utah are especially applicable to that paragraph.

I proceed with my analysis. I have discussed the paragraphs (a) and (b). The next is (c), which reads as follows:

Whoever, for the purpose aforesaid, receives or obtains or agrees or attempts or induces or aids another to receive or obtain from any person, or from any source whatever, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note, of anything connected with the national defense, knowing or having reasonable ground to believe, at the time he receives or obtains, or agrees or attempts or induces or aids another to receive or obtains, or agrees or attempts or induces or aids another to receive or obtain it, that it has been or will be obtained, taken, made or disposed of by any person contrary to the provisions of this chapter.

I would have little objection to that paragraph if paragraphs (a) and (b) were eliminated from the chapter; but it can not certainly be insisted that anyone who receives from another person any plan or copy or note or anything else pertaining to the national defense, knowing or having reason to believe that that person had acquired the information in the ordinary, usual way by which people get information in the ordinary, usual way by which people get information in our land, should be sent to the penitentiary. It simply emphasizes and intensifies the objection to paragraph (b).

Paragraph (d) provides—

Whoever, lawfully or unlawfully having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, note, or information relating to the national defense, willfully communicates or transmits or attempts to communicate or transmits the same to any person not lawfully entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it on demand to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it.

That simply means, assuming that we retain paragraph (a), that if I have obtained information for which I have received no authority I can not discuss it with my friend or my neighbor nor give him a copy of any writing or the substance of any information which I have received and which relates to the national defense. Of course this is subject to the same objection that I have already made with regard to paragraphs (a) and (b).

Paragraph (e) is as follows:

Whoever, being intrusted with or having lawful possession or control of any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, note, or information relating to the national defense, through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody or delivered to anyone in violation of his trust, or to be lost, stolen, abstracted, or destroyed.

Mr. President, I do not believe that we have reached a time when if a clerk in a department loses some record or note he ought to be punished by two years in the penitentiary and a $10,000 fine. We are going a great way when we attempt to punish gross negligence, assuming that the gross negligence has not resulted in any harm or injury to the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. NELSON. That is intended to meet such a case as occurred within a year or two at San Francisco. A naval officer who was intrusted with our naval code book, through his negligence, lost it-laid it aside. The result was that the code book fell into the hands of another Government and our Government has been compelled to prepare a new code.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have been told that was the instance which suggested this provision; but because an officer in the Navy lost a code book, which fell into the hands of another Government, are we to punish every officer or clerk or employee who may lose some writing or note? It may be that it is a very immaterial writing or note; but if he loses it, even though it can be reproduced, even though it may not have been communicated to an enemy, and, even if communicated, could do us no injury whatever, he may be prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary for two years and be fined $10,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to further interruption?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah. Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, that is qualified by the provision that it must have been lost or stolen through gross negligence-not negligence merely, but gross negligence-and, as the Senator knows, gross negligence is something which falls just a little short of being willful. We do punish people criminally for gross negligence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Never; unless the negligence does some harm.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says "unless the negligence does some harm." I am not so sure about that, although no offense of that kind occurs to me at the moment; but under the laws of some of the States we punish criminally a man who is negligent in operating an automobile and runs into a pedestrian, and we punish him for a form of manslaughter if somebody is killed.

Mr. CUMMINS. But suppose no one is killed?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not because he has willed that the thing shall be done but because he has been grossly negligent about it. Whether gross negligence, would exist in any particular case, of course, would depend upon the circumstances of that case. If, for example, the note was of such character as the Senator has just described, of no particular consequence, care in looking after it would not be required to be so great; in other words, what would be gross negligence in losing an important document which was of great value to the national defense would not be gross negligence in the case of a matter of no particular concern. The whole matter is under the control of the court and jury to deal justly in the particular case, and, moreover, it is under the further control of the judge when he comes to impose sentence. He is not obliged to impose two years' sentence; he may impose but a day's sentence.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad that the bill permits the court and jury to intervene between these offenses and the people. I really wonder that there was not a more summary method of trial provided. But, replying to the Senator from Utah, I have no objection to making gross negligence an offense. that there are times when gross negligence ought to be punished with death. There are a great many such offenses in time of war, I understand; and, if gross negligence of an employee or anybody else entitled to the possession of any of these things results in harm to the Government, I think, then, he might be punished, but to say that gross negligence resulting in the loss of an instrument of any kind that has caused no one any injury and that has brought no harm to the country seems to me to be going a very long way.

I pass now to paragraph (f); and this is really remarkable. Whether any other Government in the world ever proposed anything of this sort I do not know. Possibly the Senator from North Carolina will be able to tell the Senate whether other Governments have found it necessary to legislate upon this subject; and if so, when the legislation took place:

(f) Whoever, within the United States, sends by post or otherwise any letter or other document containing any matter written in any medium which is not visible unless subjected to heat, chemicals, or some other treatment shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

It will be observed that the offense is sending through the mails or otherwise any communication written in invisible ink, which is to be made visible only by the application of heat or some chemical. It matters not what the communication may be; it may be a love letter from one sweetheart to another; it may be any sort of confidential communication absolutely innocent in its character; and yet, seemingly, so great is the fear that the people of this country will communicate with each other in a secret way that we have here attempted to make it a crime for one person to write to another unless the writing is plain and visible.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the penalty?
Mr. CUMMINS. The penalty is imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years—that is the maximum—and $10,000 fine.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. JONES. I have looked at the Congressional Directory and I find that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed] is a member of the Judiciary Committee. As I understand, this bill was reported from that committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was.

Mr. JONES. I am amazed that such penalties as that should be prescribed for sending love notes through the mails-sending a man to the penitentiary for two years and fining him $10,000. I am amazed that the junior Senator from Missouri is not here protesting against such barbarous legislation as is proposed in that bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not wonder that the Senator from Washington is amazed. The penalties that have been suggested with regard to our legislation for prohibition are mere love taps or wrist beatings as compared with the punishment that is meted out to those who do these things

Mr. President, I have now concluded my review of section 1 of the chapter, and I again assert that these people who are trying to get information in our country to be transmitted to any other country-and I am almost willing to say whether in peace or in war-should be reached by proper penalties; but I beg the Senate not to draw the whole innocent body of the citizens into a series of crimes for things that they have been doing always. There never was a time when all of us did not do these things that are forbidden in section 1.

I now proceed to section 2.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator leaves section 1 I should like to address his attention to a feature that has had some attention at his hands, and I should like to get his view about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator referred to the Mayflower. When that ship is at her slip or dock, it becomes necessary to pass through the navy yard to reach her. Under all ordinary circumstances the citizen is permitted to go in and out at will; but now the gates are closed, and, by a rule of somebody, he is shut out from the navy yard. I suppose the Senator will recognize that some one really has lawful authority to exclude citizens from the navy yard.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I would.

Mr. WALSH. And if such lawful authority exists why should we not make it a crime for anyone who breaks through to get a view of the Mayflower when he is not wanted?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I would have no objection whatever to a law that would provide that one who entered, against the regulations of the Navy Department, a navy yard or a ship should be punished.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. President, let me ask if that is not exactly the idea advanced by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WALSH. That this means one who goes into a place like that contrary to a rule or regulation promulgated by the proper authority

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave the illustration of the Mayflower without any reference to her dock being in connection with a navy yard. She might be docked anywhere else, and the same rule would apply. I could approach her, I take it, at a great many places as she journeys around the country without trespassing upon any governmental inclosure.

Mr. WALSH. But, as suggested by the Senator from Utah, you would not then be acting without lawful authority.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. That is what I am waiting to hear from some one who is willing to stand for this chapterwho has lawful authority to know about the national defense. I proceed now to section 2:

Whoever, having committed or attempted to commit any offense defined in the preceding section, communicates, delivers, or transmits, or attempts to, or aids or induces another to communicate, deliver, or transmit, to any foreign Government, or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether recognized or unrecognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, either directly or indirectly, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, note, instrument, appliance, or information relating to the national defense, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years.

There is a part of the paragraph I have just read that seems to me to be sound, and that ought to be preserved in any changes that may be made in the chapter. But see what you are doing in another part of the same paragraph. Here is a person who has gotten information contrary to the terms of section 1. That is, he knows something about the national defense, and we will assume that he has acquired the information without lawful authority, although I do not know what that means. Then, if that person discusses in any form the information that he has with a citizen of a foreign country, whether we are at war or at peace with that country, he becomes a criminal, and he is subject to punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary for 20 years.

I submit to the better judgment of the Senators who are here that such a provision will simply make nugatory the legislation we are preparing. It is so violative of every principle of our institutions that you will not be able to find officers to enforce it; you will not be able to find citizens who will obey it.

Mark you, now, this relates to any information that may have been acquired under section 1. I have often given the illustration, and I need not give it again. If I have secured information relating to the national defense, no matter what part of the national defense it may be-a mine, a factory, a ship, or the Army-and if I discuss that question with any citizen of a foreign country, whether we are at war or at peace with that country, I become a criminal and subject to 20 years' imprisonment. To me the proposal is so wrong that I can not discuss it with composure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, is there any precedent for such drastic legislation as this?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have asked that question before-whether there is or not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I confess my own lack of information on the subject, but it strikes me as going a very long way.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a part of this now that is in harmony with free thought and free speech. That is, if a person attempts to communicate or induce any other person to communicate anything to a foreign Government or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, it seems to me to be reasonable that he should be punished. But when you pass on and provide punishment for whoever communicates or induces anybody to communicate with any representative, officer, agent, employee, subject, or citizen of any foreign country, then you pass beyond the line that ought to protect the liberty and freedom of citizens.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. Mr. OVERMAN. The question has several times been pro-Mr. OVERMAN. pounded during the speech of the Senator from Iowa whether any other countries have provided such things as this in their statutory law. I want to say that all of the countries at war have much more drastic legislation than we have upon this subject, and I think probably the most of these provisions were drafted from statutes in other countries, but we have made them very, very much less drastic than they are in other coun-

Mr. CUMMINS. Why did you make them less drastic? Mr. OVERMAN. Because it was more suitable to our form of government to have them in these terms rather than the That is the reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. If a man is to be arrested and fined and punished for these things, I do not see what more you could do to him. In my opinion, Mr. President, there are no such regulations anywhere in the world, except military regulations. I understand perfectly that Germany is now under martial law, and Great Britain is under martial law; and I have no doubt that provisions much more drastic than these are being enforced in those countries. I do not believe, however, that in times of peace Great Britain ever dreamed of any such regulations as forgotten the name of it-near that city. It was many years these. I may be wrong about it, but I should be very much surprised to learn that there ever were such statutes in Great Britain until she passed under military control. It may be that Germany had provisions something like these, but I am not willing to fashion American life after German militarism.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, we are writing laws now governing a people in time of peace, Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can understand the necessity for drastic, extraordinary laws in time of war, but that is merely a military order. This law is intended to govern a people in time of peace, with little prospect of war.

Mr. OVERMAN. We are trying to perfect our national defense.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; but we find a hobgoblin in every shadow

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I note that the paragraph I have just read closes with this paragraph, which emphasizes what I have said:

Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of this paragraph of this section in time of war shall be imprisoned for life.

It simply shows that the former part was not intended to apply to a time of war. Now we come to a paragraph that is confined to war.

SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from this subject I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it be true that the first paragraph of this section should be construed as I indicated to the Senator a moment ago that I thought it should be construed, namely, that the citizen would have a right in spite of this provision to go into a fort or to examine a vessel belonging to the United States, or anything of that kind, unless the thing was forbidden by a law of Congress or by a regulation or order of the Department of War, does the Senator see any objection to punishing a man who, having violated that regulation or law or order, and in violation of it having obtained the information, then turns about and communicates it either to a foreign Government or to a citizen of a foreign Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Utah probably did not notice that I began my comment upon this paragraph by saying that if section 1 were properly confined I could see great, if any, objection to this paragraph of section 2. It is only because I do not agree at all with the view taken by the Senator from Utah as to section 1 that I have made the criticisms just submitted upon so much of section 2.

Now, I want the Senator from Utah to understand my thought. I do not want to go on any dock or in any arsenal or on any ship or in any fort. I am perfectly willing that the President shall have the right to exclude everybody from those But section 1 of this chapter broadens those places which have hitherto been regarded as purely governmental affairs to the whole country

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, it broadens it, if the President or an agent of the President acting under his authority makes a regulation forbidding the entry upon the place or acquiring information about the thing. I would agree exactly with the Senator from Iowa if I could agree with his premises. If the Senator is right in his construction of this section, obviously he is right in his conclusion. If the section does not mean what I think it does mean, it ought to be amended, as I view it, so that it will be clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah will sit down and write a section 1 of the first chapter, using the language that he has employed in explaining or interpreting section 1, I shall have nothing further to say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, there is only this danger about that-and the Senator from Iowa, who is a splendid lawyer and about as acute in the use of language as anybody I ever met, understands perfectly the danger—when you come to enumerate a number of things there is danger that you will omit something that you ought to include, and therefore it is better wherever you can in a statute to use general language instead of particular language. The Senator understands perfectly the danger of doing that. Now, in stating what I thought the general language meant, I have stated some of the things I thought it meant, but in all probability I have not stated all of the things that are meant by it.

If the Senator will bear with me just for another suggestion by way of illustration, some years ago I happened to be in San Francisco and went out to visit one of the forts—I have ago, before I was a Member of Congress. I wanted to see all I could of it as a matter of curiosity, not that I was concerned about what was there, but I was simply curious; and I was told that I could see certain things, and certain other things could not see. Among other things, I remember distinctly that they had been installing some disappearing guns, and I was not permitted to go near those guns. I was expressly forbidden to do it. Now, I could go anywhere else in the fort; I could see the buildings; I could see the general arrangement of it, and all that. Now, I would have been at perfect liberty under this statute to have gone out and told anybody the result of my examination of this fort in all of these particulars; but if, in spite of this statement that I would not be permitted to see these disappearing guns, I had insisted upon doing so and had gone there, I would have been guilty of an offense under the first section-

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator would.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And I think properly I would have been held guilty and punished.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then if in addition to that I had communicated the information I had obtained with reference to those disappearing guns to some foreign Government, to a representative or even to a citizen of a foreign Government, I ought to have been punished under the second section.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably.
Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, that is what I understand this provision to mean.

Mr. CHMMINS I also understand it to mean that, but it means a great deal more. That is the difficulty. Every instance that has been brought forward here has been an instance of an offense that ought to be punished. That is the only reply that is being made to me—that certain things have been done, or may be done, which are detrimental to the public welfare and to the national defense, and that they ought to be prohibited. say, yes, they ought to be prohibited, but when you are prohibiting them do not at the same time make crimes of a thousand innocent acts of the people. That is what I am objecting to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the Senator from Iowa conceive of a case where the citizen is not entitled to go anywhere in the United States or obtain any information unless it is ferbidden by some lawful authority or is in violation of somebody's rights?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I do not know what the words "lar fully entitled" mean.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am quite certain that they mean, in that statute, something which has been forbdiden by lawful authority. Anything that has been forbidden by lawful authority, a citizen is not lawfully entitled to obtain. If it has not been forbidden by some lawful authority, then the citizen is entitled to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. That is simply arguing in a circle, however. The Senator says "forbidden by some lawful authority." Who has lawful authority to forbid these things?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Constitution very clearly shows in this instance who has lawful authority. That is the President; but, of course, the President can not always act in his own proper person. He acts by agents. He acts by the Secretary of War, by the Secretary of the Navy, and by subordinate officers.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the Senator means that provision of the Constitution which makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely. It has been held repeatedly under that, as the Senator knows, that the President has the power to make regulations and rules governing the conduct of the Army and the defense of the Nation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the President the power, as Commander in Chief of the Army, to say that one shall not enter the factory of the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not unless it has become a part of the national defense; no.

Mr. CUMMINS. Exactly. No one knows what does become a part of the national defense. I suppose he could say that a certain part of a city was so connected with the national defense that everybody must move out of it and no one should be permitted to enter it. I think he could do that in time of war, but I do not believe he could do that in time of peace.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the citizen would not be guilty if he violated it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then you ask the citizen to incur the risk of determining whether a presidential order or an order of a commander in chief is valid or invalid.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The citizen does that when he thinks a law of Congress is not constitutional; he has a perfect right to refuse to follow it if he wants to take the risk.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I think the argument of the Senator from Utah is the severest condemnation of this chapter that I have heard, and certainly much more conclusive than anything I have said. He has described precisely what the law ought to be, and there should be and is no difficulty in reducing the law to the terms which he has so clearly expressed, and when it is reduced to such terms, or anything like such terms, he will not find me opposing it.

I return now to paragraph "b" of section 2, and I pass it because I have no objection to it. It simply prescribes the death penalty for communicating to an enemy information concerning our military operations. I say I have no objection to it, but I have. It is, however, a general objection. I am opposed to capital punishment for any offense, but I do not think a discussion upon that subject would be material to the present debate.

I now come to paragraph "e," and this is the paragraph which will arouse most interest throughout the country, I am sure. I

Whoever, in fime of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aeroplanes, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense or calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10.000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

As this bill was originally introduced, as it was drawn in the office of the Attorney General, the crime was described without any reference to regulations to be prescribed by the President. It was simply made criminal for anyone to promulgate, collect, record, publish, or communicate, and so forth, any information with respect to any of these things, all of which may be combined in the one expression "relating to the national defense."

This is the paragraph of which I said before in the committee, and which I now say again, had it been in force in the last two years three-fourths of the people of the United States would have been in the penitentiary, or ought to have been in the penitentiary, because it was an absolute suppression of free speech, it was an absolute overthrow of a free press. I made that objection to it before the committee; and the way in which it has been amended is to insert the words "in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and to promulgate." Instead of overturning the freedom of the people by one act, we have simply delegated the authority to the President to overturn and obliterate that freedom. Under this provision the Presi-dent can absolutely command silence in the United States upon every subject mentioned in the paragraph. He can suppress every suggestion concerning the national defense in every newspaper of the land. I am not sure whether he would be able to make it an offense for Members of Congress to discuss the national defense. I am inclined to think that we could still preserve our constitutional privileges in that respect, and at any rate we could take shelter behind the immunity given to us in the Constitution for what we say upon the floor of Congress, but the moment we would emerge from these sacred confines then the President could require that we should be silent upon everything pertaining to the national defense.

I was very unwilling to make it an offense directly to do these things, and I am quite as unwilling to give the President the authority to prescribe any such regulations. I am willing to undertake with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] or the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Overman] to draw a code for the regulation of citizens in civil life during a time of war, for I ought to remark that this paragraph is in force only in time of war; but, I think, it is the most remarkable authority I have ever heard suggested for any executive of any free country. It is an authority that the tyrants of the olden times never dared to exercise. You can not find an instance in either ancient or modern history in which any monarch has attempted to put upon his people the restrictions which the President can put upon our people under this paragraph.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator understand that these forbidden things are all to take place in time of war?

Mr. CUMMINS. I just said so. Mr. FLETCHER. I did not understand from the Senator's argument that he appreciated that the clause is in the bill, "in time of war." All these things are to take place in time of

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. Mr. FLETCHER. I might say this to the Senator: He will recall what is called the national-defense act which was pas March 3, 1911. That was considered insufficient, and the bill known as Senate bill 258 was reported in the Senate, and it was not thought to be broad enough. The matter was referred down to the department. The chapter the Senator is now discussing was submitted February 5 and has been approved by the War Department, the Navy Department, and I believe by the General Board. I call attention to the fact that all these matters have been pretty thoroughly considered by the department and re-ported back to us in this form, and they are quite important and necessary for proper protection in time of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Every word the Senator from Florida has said is true. If I understand him, I think this paragraph has been not only very carefully considered in the executive departments but it originated in the executive departments. I any doubt that the executive departments would be glad to see Congress abolished entirely. I have been led to believe in the last few years that the executive departments think that Congress is of little value to the people of this country our safety would be better conserved and our welfare better promoted by the deposit of substantially all governmental power in the Executive Office. I think they are perfectly sincere about that. I do not accuse them of any deception about it. They have made their purpose entirely plain in a variety of ways.

I am unwilling, however, speaking seriously, Mr. President, to give the President, even in time of war, the authority to command silence upon all public matters.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has referred to it often, that he resents the idea that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of the Coast Guard Service, and so on, should get together, have a meeting probably, and agree that the law is defective in many respects, and that certain laws are necessary in this country for the national defense, and to carry out their recommendations send the bills down here to the Judiciary Committee to consider. Does not the Senator think they are doing their duty when these great men who preside over the Navy Department, the War Department, and the Treasury Department, and the President of the United States, get together and say we need certain laws and they recommend to Congress the enactment of laws for the national defense? Does the Senator criticize them for that action?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir. Mr. OVERMAN. That is just what they have done. They have sent down here a recommendation in the shape of a bill that they think ought to be passed in order to protect the national defense. Everybody recognizes the weakness of our laws on this subject; that we have practically no law to protect our country in these places, and because they sent the draft of a bill here that they think necessary for the protection of our country does the Senator criticize them for that?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir; I have not done so.
Mr. OVERMAN. I do not understand, then, why the Senator

Mr. CUMMINS. What I have just said is that it is not strange that these departments should think that their chief was a very proper depository of all this power.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator intimated that the bill was sent down here and the Judiciary Committee rather accepted what the department recommended without consideration, that we had not considered it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is measurably true. not say without consideration, but what I said was, although I have not said it recently, not in the last few minutes, that these bills did not receive the same kind of consideration which they would have received had they been the product of a Senator

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not understand why the Senator should say that. He has repeated that two or three times during this debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not have done it if the Senator had not been drawing it from me all the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I just came into the Chamber, and I said nothing when the Senator referred to it. The Senator has repeated it, and I have asked him the question whether he thinks when these great men in the Cabinet who preside over great departments and who are looking after the destinies of this country agree among themselves that we have no law such as we need for defense, and that we need laws to protect and defend this country, why he should criticize them for doing that thing.

Now, as to the other point, the consideration of this bill, it was referred to a subcommittee. It is true that some of us are not as able as the Senator. The Senator is a very able man, and he is able to criticize any bill, and he generally criticize a bill that comes before us. It was referred to subcommittee of four Senators, and was then taken up before the full committee, and nearly all the members of the committee were there. The Senator himself came in two or three times. He was there a few times and made some objection, but did not come back any more. We stayed there and considered these bills day in and day out for a week, and I do not think this criticism of us is justified.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have made no such criticism. I have stated what I believe to be a fact, and the Senator from North Carolina has not denied it. If he will deny it, I will accept any statement he makes. The utmost I have said is that these bills having emanated from the office of one of the departments of the Government were not considered in the same way that they would have been considered if they had come from a Senator. I believe that to be true, no matter how long the Judiciary Committee may have sat in the consideration of them, no matter what amendments may have been made to them.

I now return to the other suggestion. Mr. President, if we are to consider the proper relations between the departments of the Government, I believe they ought not to meet together and agree upon bills to be sent to Congress. The Constitution provides how the Executive shall communicate with Congress. dent believes there is a weakness in our law, it is his privilege, it is his duty, to communicate his judgment to Congress. it is the responsibility of Congress to deal with his communication in a way in which it ought to be dealt with. But without reflecting in the least upon the distinguished Attorney General, for I have the highest regard for him; I think he is a patriotwithout reflecting upon the head of any other department I believe we are rapidly taking on a custom which in the future will defeat in a large measure the usefulness of Congress. I believe Congress is rapidly becoming the mere scrivener for the executive department. In the years to come even more than now, if we do not correct this tendency, it will be our privilege to per-functorily register and record the bills that have been prepared in the departments and sent to Congress for its action.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. I gladly yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not been informed about these measures nor the reasons which induced their preparation by the department, but I have rather assumed that they were suggested by events that transpired shortly after the European war The Senator will recall when a foreign ambassador was recalled and other foreign officials who were connected in one way or another with this Government as a representative of other governments were sent home or invited to go home a good many things were being committed here which led to an investigation by several of the departments to ascertain the condition not only as to the facts that were then in existence but as to the law which would enable such people to be punished who were committing depredations against the property of citizens of this country. This bill was the result of investigations which were then had and which showed that our Government did not have the laws to punish those people. Under these circumstances, does not the Senator feel that the men who have investigated it and who knew wherein the deficiency in the law lay were the best men to prepare the law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. I believe they are the best men to give Congress the information upon which the law should be prepared, and I have no objection to their advice as to the form of the law.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator knows as well as anyone here that it would be almost a physical impossibility for one Senator or half a dozen Senators to get together and formulate a law that would meet these conditions, even if they had all the facts. I think the Senator will recognize that even in the legislative bodies in the States where a bill of any importance is to be prepared it frequently happens that an attorney outside, who gave exclusive attention to the subject, prepares a bill and then it is submitted to the legislative body. to me it is the easiest thing to get laws before Congress in this way, and then the Senate can criticize them and remodel them and reform them to suit themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. The only trouble in getting laws before us in that way is that there is not the same liberty of dealing with them that would exist if they were to come before us in another way. Gradually I have seen the insidious approach, and so has every Senator. Gradually we will accept the bills as they come from the departments without any change, because we will come to rely upon their superior judgment with regard to public

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to make this suggestion to the Senator: The circumstances mentioned by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] did develop that in the judgment of the Department of Justice, based upon their experience and investigation, the national-defense act of 1911 was imperfect and in-They reported back to Congress, and the Attorney General submitted a bill (S. 258) to meet some of the defects and to cure the imperfection in the national-defense act. The committee naturally turned to the Department of Justice to point out wherein the act was defective and wherein it was incomplete, and to submit to us recommendations. The Department of Justice took that up with the other departments, and the result is this bill. Of course, I do not mean to say that by way of indicating that the committee of the Senate or any Senator has not a perfect right to tear it to pieces if it can be done, but I am simply saying that it was quite natural that the department which had found the laws which we put on the statute books in 1911 defective and incomplete should be called upon to suggest a cure for those defects.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not dwell further upon the particular way in which this bill came into Congress. I mention the matter only incidentally, anyhow. I am a great deal more interested in what the bills contain than I am in their origin.

I pass now to section 3, and I intend to make the remainder of my comment upon the chapter very brief, for I have already occupied the floor much longer than I had any dream of doing. Section 3 of chapter 1 provides:

Sec. 3. Whoever, in time of war, shall, by any means or in any manner, spread or make reports or statements, or convey any information, with intent to cause disaffection in or to interfere with the operations, or success of, the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully spread or make false reports or statements or convey any false information calculated to cause such disaffection or interference, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 and by imprisonment for life or any period less than 30 years.

The first part of the section I have read is, I think, unobjectionable, for the crime involves an "intent to cause disaffection in or to interfere with the operations, or success of, the military or naval forces of the United States." The latter part of the section, it seems to me, is, however, exceedingly dangerous and it ought to be very materially modified. It says:

Of shall willfully spread-

Of course, anyone who spreads at all, spreads willfullyor make false reports or statements or convey any false information calculated to cause such disaffection.

A man may circulate a report or a statement-and the subject is not limited; it may be upon any subject whatsoever-but if it is calculated to cause disaffection or interference with the military or naval forces of the United States he becomes liable to imprisonment for life or for any period less than 30 years. I do not believe that we can afford in our country, even in time of war, to make every man a guarantor for the truth of the statements or reports which he may circulate or spread. I do not think we can afford to subject one who issues a statement, which turns out to be false, to a fine of $10,000 or to life imprisonment or to imprisonment for any period less than 30 years.

Mr. REED. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. REED. The language is:

Or shall willfully spread or make false reports or statements or convey ny false information calculated to cause such disaffection or inter-

Is it the Senator's opinion that the word "willfully" does not qualify the entire clause?

Mr. CUMMINS. I heard the Senator declare the other day that, used in that connection, it did not; and I believe he was right.

Mr. REED. The Senator heard me raise the question whether the word "willfully" in some other bill qualified some other clause.

Mr. CUMMINS. In connection with one of our prohibitory bills.

Mr. REED. But I am asking the Senator, not in a controversial spirit at all, but with the desire to get his opinion, whether it is his judgment that the word "willfully" does not qualify all that follows, so that the bill in effect means—"or who shall willfully spread or make false reports, knowing the same to be false"-whether the word "willfully" does not imply knowledge?

Mr. CUMMINS. But the word "knowingly" is not here. Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that if he or any other Senator thinks that the word "willfully" could be o construed as to mean simply that the paper or document was purposely put in the mail or otherwise distributed, and that that did not imply a knowledge of the falsity of the article, then I think the language ought to be changed, for there ought to be no doubt about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was quite serious when I said I heard the Senator from Missouri make an argument upon that subject the other day, and it was that argument which first attracted my attention to this particular section of the chapter. It convinced me, and I have since been of that opinion, that the word "willfully" does not qualify the word "false"; that a statement may be willfully spread without being willfully false.

Mr. REED. Of course, if a man willfully made false reports he should be punished.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would remove, in my judgment, the entire objection which I have made to the section. All I object to is that it is too severe a penalty to impose upon one who spreads reports, who intentionally starts a report, but does not intend to produce any injury to his country or to its land and naval forces. If he knows it to be false, I would take quite a different view of the section.

I pass on, for I take it that various amendments will be offered before the chapter is fully considered.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further!

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. REED. In order to make my meaning plain, suppose we should insert after the words "willfully spread," which is the phrase used, the words "knowing the same to be false, or make false reports or statements or convey any false informa-tion knowing the same to be false," would that be satisfactory?

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be entirely satisfactory Mr. REED. I think, as the doubt has been raised, that the committee ought to modify the language.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the matter is fully covered; but as the able Senator from Iowa differs and thinks there is doubt about it, I have no objection to accepting that amendment right

I think it will have to be rewritten.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Iowa offer an amendment to that language?

Mr. REED. I would not want to offer the amendment in a haphazard way, because, while I can express the idea very plainly with a great many words, I think it can be expressed in very few words.

Mr. OVERMAN. Probably the Senator from Iowa has an amendment to cover that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall have amendments to propose, assuming that we do not conclude the bill to-night.

Mr. President, I have already commented upon section 6 of chapter 1.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator passes from his criticism of the use of the word "false" without any qualification, the Senator will recall that we had in the Judiciary Committee a discussion of the same matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I remember that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And it was finally there determined that the word "false" itself implies a species of knowledge or deliberation. In that connection I call attention to the definition of the word "false" in Bouvier's Law Dictionary, where it is given its legal signification. Of course it means something more than untrue.

False. Applied to the intentional act of a responsible being, it implies a purpose to deceive.

Citing authorities-

In a statute prescribing punishment for false statements in making an entry of imported goods, "false" means more than incorrect or erroneous. It implies wrong or culpable negligence, and signifies knowingly or negligently untrue.

So that, particularly in a criminal statute, the word "false," unlike the word "untrue," implies all that the Senator from Iowa thinks it should imply.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is some ground for the contention just made by the Senator from Utah, but we have not been in the habit of drawing criminal statutes that are susceptible to different interpretations or constructions; and I do not want the word "false" to go into the law unaccompanied by any qualification.

Mr. REED. I suggest this amendment to the committee and to the Senator from Iowa, who has the floor: In line 7 strike out the word "or" and insert the words "whoever, knowing the same to be false," so that the clause would read:

And whoever, knowing the same to be false, shall willfully spread or make false reports or statements or convey any false information calculated to cause such disaffection or interference shall be punished—

And so forth. With those words in, I think the entire phrase is qualified as the Senator from Iowa thinks it should be.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri will cure every objection I have to the paragraph, but inasmuch as I am passing through the entire chapter and analyzing it as best I can, I would prefer that action on the amendment should not be taken at this time, as I am about to close my comment upon the chapter.

was remarking a moment ago, section 6 is the section which gives to the President the power to designate any place in the United States other than those set forth in paragraph (a) of section 1 as a prohibited place which one not lawfully entitled to do so is forbidden to approach or to enter or to acquire any information about. I need not say more than I have already said in regard to that section.

These are my objections to chapter 1. I think that, taking the chapter as a whole, it is subversive of the civil liberty of our citizens. I think it will render life in times of peace unsafe. I think it will subject the freedom of the people to the will or whim of the executive officers of the United States. I think it is vastly more important, Mr. President, that we preserve untouched and unmodified the spirit of our institutions than it is to guard every avenue through which information concerning our national defense may escape.

I will at the proper time offer certain amendments to this chapter as well as to other parts of the bill.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I desire to ask the acting chairman of the committee whether this bill has not been prepared upon the theory of preventing espionage in advance of war, rather than of preventing espionage after war has commenced; and as to whether it is possible, without interference with the commerce and natural liberties of a people, practically to prevent espionage before war commences?

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill provides for the prevention of espionage in time of peace, when war is imminent, while war is flagrant in the land, and after war—at all times.

Mr REED Mr President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment, which I hope the chairman of the committee will accept. I have already called his attention to it. In section 3, page 6, line 7, strike out the word or " and insert " and whoever, knowing the same to be false."
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. In chapter 1, section 3, on page 6, line 7, after the words "United States," strike out the word "or" where it occurs the second time, and insert "and whoever, knowing the same to be false," so that if amended it will read:

SEC, 3. Whoever in time of war shall, by any means or in any manner, spread or make reports or statements, or convey any information, with intent to cause disaffection in or to interfere with the operations or success of the military or naval forces of the United States, and whoever, knowing the same to be false, shall willfully spread or make false reports or statements or convey any false information calculated to cause such disaffection or interference, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 and by imprisonment for life or any period less than 30 years.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the words suggested by the Senator from Missouri cover what was intended by the committee and what, after discussion, the committee concluded the words "false reports" would be construed to mean; but, inasmuch as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has some doubt about it, I will offer no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to say a word further. During my absence from the Senate it seems that my name has been taken in vain by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. were discussing paragraph (f), which reads:

Whoever, within the United States, sends by post, or otherwise, any letter or other document containing any matter written in any medium which is not visible unless subjected to heat, chemicals, or some other treatment, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

When that was under discussion the following colloquy oc-

Mr. CUMMINS. The penalty is imprisonment in the penitentiary for two years—that is the maximum—and $10,000 fine.

Mr. Jones. Mr. President—
The President Officer. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?
Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.
Mr. Jones. I have looked at the Congressional Directory, and I find that the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. Reed] is a member of the Judiciary Committee. As I understand, this bill was reported from that committee.

Judiciary Committee. As I understand, this bill was reported from that committee.

Mr. Cummins. It was.

Mr. Jones. I am amazed that such penalties as that should be prescribed for sending love notes through the mails—sending a man to the penitentiary for two years and fining him $10,000. I am amazed that the junior Senator from Missouri is not here protesting against such barbarous legislation as is proposed in that bill.

Mr. Cummins. I do not wonder that the Senator from Washington is amazed. The penalties that have been suggested with regard to our legislation for prohibition are mere love taps or wrist beatings as compared with the punishment that is meted out to those who do these things.

Now, Mr. President, of course this was all a bit of pleasantry, had in my absence from the Chamber. I would not treat it seriously except that the pathetic character of the humor forbids levity. However, I think I should assure the Senator from Washington that if he is in the habit of writing his love letters in invisible ink, and therefore feels that the clause of the bill against which he protested will infringe his personal liberties or compel him to alter his habits, I shall be delighted to support an amendment which will except him from the penalties of the act.

The truth about the matter is that while I am a member of the Judiciary Committee, as is the Senator from Iowa, like the Senator from Iowa I found it impossible to be present at all times when this legislation was being considered. I know that the Senator from Iowa was, during a part of that time, serving upon another important committee which required his attendance. It happens to be my fortune to be a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, which was considering im-portant legislation, and also of the Commerce Committee, which was considering the river and harbor bill, and all three committees were sitting at the same time; so that while I gave to this bill when in committee such attention as I could the particular clause under discussion never came to my attention until this afternoon, when I learned of the witty remarks of my friend.

However, the bill does relate to serious matters, and this clause of the bill is intended to prevent practices which may be very dangerous. Nevertheless, I remark now, lest I should forget it later, that I believe the clause is very imperfectly drawn. It should be amended, and I will endeavor to draft an amendment which will more clearly express the purpose which was in the mind of its author. The purpose and, I think, the construction which would be given, notwithstanding the somewhat broad and sweeping language of the clause, was to prevent the information of the kind and character which is prohibited by the other clauses of the bill being transmitted through the medium of invisible writing—an act which in itself clearly indicates the purpose of the writer to send the information in such a way as to prevent the authorities from knowing that it is being conveyed. The section of the bill is intended to relate distinctly to that kind of communication which is adopted by spies or those who conspire against our Government, and the proposition must be treated from that standpoint.

Mr. President, conceding, as I do, that the language ought to be made clearer—for I think there never should be any doubt as to the purpose of a law if that doubt can be removed by a proper use of the English tongue—I nevertheless take this occasion to call attention to the fact that a very grave situation confronts the United States at this moment. We have so long been in a condition of real or imagined security that it is difficult for us to understand that a great menace confronts the At absolute peace with ourselves, and desiring peace with all the world, it is very difficult for the American people to imagine that any foreign power will so conduct itself as to menace our rights as a Nation. But the man who will not be aroused to a state of anxiety and caution, and whose sober judgment will not be enlisted, by the circumstances that now confront us is very dull indeed.

We do not know at what moment the bolt may fall. We hope, and we will continue to hope and to pray, that our country will escape being drawn into conflict with any nation, great or small. But when we have proceeded to a point where it has be-come necessary to sever diplomatic relations with a great nation, and when we find that a policy is being pursued that is violative of our rights as a sovereign power upon the high seas, when we see American commerce congested in our ports and the threat boldly made that every vessel will be sunk that dares sail the seas unless it obeys the rules laid down by another nation, when we know that the threat is being boldly and relentlessly executed, it is time to set our house in order, still hoping for peace, but preparing for whatever may eventuate.

This bill may contain language that is too broad; it may contain phraseology which must be modified; but it would be a better service to the country if Senators, instead of sneering at it and simply performing the office of carping critics, were to bring to it their highest thought and best energies in order that the measure might be speedily perfected and enacted into a law.

This bill is intended to apply to two conditions: First, to a case of actual war; second, to a case so threatening that the President shall be justified in declaring an emergency to exist. It is not conceivable that the President will declare such an emergency out of mere caprice or in obedience to a mere whim. It must be regarded that the President will not exercise the great powers conferred by this bill unless conditions are so grave as to warrant the action.

You say that the bill confers great powers upon the President. Powers, sir, must be reposed somewhere. Under the Constitution we have given to the President the supreme command of the Army and the Navy of the United States. It is always possible that some President may abuse that great power. day some President may try to employ it to subvert the liberties of the American people. That argument was made when the Constitution was written. And yet the power to command the Army and the Navy had to be placed in some human agency. It was necessary that the trust should be reposed in some human It was believed then and experience has thus far warranted the confidence that the President would not abuse that power.

If we can confer the supreme command of the Army and Navy upon the President, we surely can trust him not to declare an emergency unless a real emergency exists. I speak not alone of the present Executive. The same statement could have been made of his predecessors. I know of no instance where a President of the United States has not always evinced a patriotic love of his country and of the liberties of the people.

It is said that "this bill will circumscribe the liberties of the press." In time of war, or threatened war, it may be necessary to limit the right of the press to send out information which will be beneficial to the enemy as it is to limit the right of the private citizen. In time of war, or grave danger of war, the ordinary liberties and rights of all of the citizens of a country must give way to the supreme necessity of the hour.

Newspapers perform a most useful function. For the complete liberty of the press all of us have always stood. And yet, if we were in a state of war and newspapers were permitted to print every movement of our Army, every movement of the Navy, they might be performing an office more dangerous to us than would be the presence of a thousand spies who were operating only through secret channels. It might be that information would thus be given to the enemy which would result in the sinking of the American Navy. It might be that the publication of the plans of a fortress or the location and character of a line of defense conveyed to the enemy would give to the enemy commander such an advantage as would enable him to overwhelm our troops. The price of a single article giving important information might be paid in the blood of thousands of

It is said we need no such law in time of peace. There may be conditions so closely approximating the dangers of war that the authority must be exercised even though war has not yet occurred. Let me give you an illustration. I do it without the slightest offense, I hope, against the particular newspaper I hold in my hand. I will say by way of parenthesis that what it did the other day is no worse than other papers have been I speak of the article therefore merely for purposes of illustration. Here is the Washington Times of yesterday. Let me read the headlines:

Wilson plans big naval demonstration against German U-boat campaign.

Tentative arrangement to be laid before Cabinet meeting to-day.

Made in secret.

Then follows the statement in the body of the article that-

The plans are understood to have been completed at a secret meeting of the Naval Officers' League last night at the Navy Department, following the conference which the President held late yesterday afternoon at the White House and at the State, War, and Navy Building, Secretary of State Lansing, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, and Secretary of War Paker tary of Stat War Baker.

With some omissions, this follows:

While the greatest amount of secrecy has been thrown about the meeting, it is learned that the plans agreed upon for submission to the President embrace every phase of future developments, from the arming of American merchant ships with naval guns to an active campaign against the German U boats. Also considered and arranged for, it is understood, was the intermediary step of convoying American merchant vessels through the war zone.

There is more of the article, but notice the import of it. Naval and military officers hold a secret meeting. Why secret? So that their plans may be effectively put into execution. The Cabinet meets in secret to consider it. Why secret? Because the knowledge conveyed to the country with which we unfortunately sustain strained relations might defeat our plans. Yet a newspaper regards it as entirely proper and as a highly commendable piece of journalism to publish broadcast to the world all it can find out and all it can infer with reference to those

I do not impugn the motives of this paper. I say that it is a part of the general policy that has been pursued by the press for many years, and yet I venture the opinion that if the editor of the Times had been asked to convey that same information to a German officer he would at once have said, "If the Cabinet desire that this shall be secret, and if the military authorities desire that it shall be secret, I, as a patriotic American citizen, will not breathe a word of it." I know he would have said that.

Possibly no harm was done by the publication by the press the statements I have referred to. Nevertheless it serves to of the statements I have referred to. Nevertheless it serves to illustrate what is likely to happen if international relations re-Likewise it shows what is certain to occur if unhappily war does come, namely, that the proprietors of the press, desiring to furnish their readers with information, having that motive and that purpose in mind, will print every-thing they can get to print. They will not pause to consider what uses an enemy may make of the information.

So when we propose this character of legislation it is not out of enmity to the press, neither does it spring from a desire to throttle public discussion or to subvert the liberties of the people, but it is because the safety, aye, perhaps the life, of the Nation may be jeopardized by the indiscriminate publication of information. The measure, therefore, viewed in that light is not a hard measure directed against the press or against the rights of the citizens; it is, on the contrary, calculated to protect the country itself and hence to protect the rights and liberties of all its inhabitants.

Mr. President, I have referred particularly to the press because it has always been regarded as one of the institutions of our country that is to be given the fullest liberty, and with that sentiment I am in complete accord, but the illustration I have used I desire to have applied to all the provisions of this bill. These provisions are intended for times of danger. They are meant to be employed only for the protection of the Nation. The abuse of a single one of these powers would result in an instant repeal of the law by Congress.

Therefore we ought to regard this measure as a very solemn We ought to discuss it fairly, having in view only the production of the wisest law we can frame. We ought also to bring the legislation to the point of passage and signature at as early an hour as possible.

Let me say this in conclusion. Those who have watched the war between the central powers and the allies have observed one thing: Germany has always been ready; the allies have rarely been ready until blow after blow has been struck. Let us employ the days we now have so that if the worst comes to the worst we shall at least have the satisfaction of feeling we have done our best.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, the question arises in my mind, as I listen to the remarks on this bill from Senators who seem to be considering it quite judicially, as to whether or not the provisions in the bill, intended to prevent improper reports getting abroad with reference to American military conditions, are not so light and comprehensive that they will tend to cut off a legitimate discussion of unpreparedness in this coun-We are a Republic, and we are subject, as a Republic, to the infirmity of a lack of military preparation. The Senator from Missouri has just referred to that condition. An imperial nation, with an imperial head and a military aristocracy, if it has any virtue at all will have enough of military discipline and preparation and more than enough. But in a republic there is generally need to have the public mind stimulated and awakened to the necessity of some reasonable preparation for war.

I have been somewhat of late in the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and so far as I can judge it is the opinion of the chairman, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Chamberlain], who is here now, that the country at large, rather than the War Department and Congress, is responsible for our present lack of preparation.

Mr. President, does not the language of this bill go so far as to practically prohibit citizens in public meetings from speaking in detail of the unpreparedness of the country, because to speak definitely, to describe actual conditions, would be information affecting the national defense?

Winter before last, if I remember correctly, a friend in New York sent me a letter from Gen. Scott, which I put into the RECORD in connection with our having no great movable guns. By reason of the way in which the Germany artillery destroyed the fortresses of Liege and Namur large stationary guns in fortresses are held to be no longer a defense to a country, and it was thus discovered by the allies and our own military men that the great gun must also be a movable gun, because if it has a fixed position the movable and concealed gun of the enemy will necessarily destroy it. That letter from Gen. Scott to this gentleman in New York, in answer to an inquiry on this subject of great movable guns, stated that after considerable effort the general had persuaded the Secretary of War and the General Staff to agree to the manufacture of six such guns, and that they were going to manufacture the six guns, but they had not yet arrived at a proper kind of mount to put them on, and as soon as the plans for the mount were prepared they were going to go ahead and manufacture the six movable guns, all they apparently contemplated of that absolutely essential form of ordnance under modern conditions.

Mr. President, last winter, after one year, we had not manufactured them, and now, after another year, if a citizen happens to know, as I know that these guns have not yet been manufactured, can he not mention the subject? Would he not be open to the penalties of this act for discussing a lack of preparedness in the War Department of which every government in Europe is fully aware? Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is absolutely pertinent to our national defense that we should have some of these great movable Six hundred of them-several thousand of them-would be in proportion to the coast lines we have to defend. a citizen ascertaining these facts, organizes an agitation in this country for some remedy, even in time of peace, is not that citizen open to the indictment of this proposed statute?

Mr. President, I sympathize very greatly with all the feelings that these gentlemen have expressed about the necessity of protecting governmental and military secrets, but in a republic, in a country like ours, that has so little land preparation, in attempting to conceal so-called secrets, are we not concealing them from ourselves only and more likely to prevent the proper development of our military defense than to advise an enemy?

As I look at this situation, so far as from suppressing any detailed agitation and comment upon the lack of preparation in the country, comment ought to be stimulated. The country needs more agitation than it does secrecy just at this stage of our national armament.

I have been listening with a great deal of interest to the comments of the various Members of the Senate on this bill, because I can not help feeling that in seeking one end they have, to a certain extent in the preparation of the bill, overlooked the general conditions that confront a free country trying to arm itself and to protect its national and international rights.

This is a very drastic measure, Mr. President; and without feeling at this stage that I should vote against it, I certainly hope that there will be some definition put into the bill, something wherewithal to protect the citizens of the Republic in the exercise, in times of peace at least, of what might be called cus-tomary rights in the exercise of their ordinary avocations.

I could not help thinking of the situation in my State as I heard the debate going on. Nearly every county seat in Maryland has a militia company with an armory either built by the State or rented. In that armory are the rifles and equipment These armories are also used for social purposes, speaking, and lectures. Everybody knows how many rifles are there; but it is to be made a crime to go there in time Generally speaking, these towns are on the railroads. Now, suppose that under this section 6 the President makes the railway one of the so-called secret places that you could not go near. The armory being already in seclusion, a citizen passing over the railway going to get his mail, say, and into that armory would have violated, in a time of peace, two of the prohibitions in this statute.

Possibly this proposed law may have some other aim than the one expressed. It may be that it is going to settle the railroadstrike question in an indirect manner. But whatever may be the real significance of this statute, it does seem to me that its terms are so comprehensive that they overshoot the mark with reference to military precautions in time of peace.

I agree fully with everything that the statute has in it with reference to times of war. That is a different condition. Take the question of locating these great movable and concealed guns. In times of war all population can be taken out of the section I where these guns are to be located. Sentries can be posted and the concealment of the great pieces, or any other military preparation that is necessary can go on, and the death penalty be visited upon the person improperly revealing these military But in time of peace in a republican form of government criticism of the acts and more especially of the neglects of the Government with reference to military preparation are pertinent and right. It does seem to me, Mr. President, that this bill as now worded goes too far.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from Maryland takes his seat I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of giving out information in time of peace, and says it is entirely proper to visit the death penalty for such an offense. Of course he means that the death penalty might be visited in an extreme case. But now let us take a situation like this—I will put a hypothetical case, so that it will not have any bearing on present conditions: Suppose our country was so situated that the President knew in all human probability that war was about to be declared against us, but that war has not been declared; and, in order to be ready, the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, should undertake to have established a line of secret batteries so posted as to protect the city of Baltimore; and, in order to keep that information from getting out, he were to declare an emergency, such as this bill contemplates must exist if the declaration is made, and some individual were to slip in, find the location of these batteries, and carry the information where it would do us the most injury; and all this occurred in time of peace, but also during an emergency such as this bill provides for, would the Senator say that Congress ought not to pass some legislation to reach that kind of a case?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Has the Senator finished his question?

Yes

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, the hypothetical case suggested by the Senator from Missouri is precisely what I was talking about, namely, the location of these great guns in such manner that their positions could not be revealed to an enemy. My feeling is that such guns can not be finally located until war is declared and absolutely tight lines of military exclusion are drawn to protect the location of such pieces from common knowledge; and my general feeling would be that any attempt to draw such lines upon the commerce of the people in times of peace would really not keep out the spies of an enemy but would simply operate to inconvenience and harass our own people.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that military men with actual experience in the management of the great artillery struggles on the other side would, with ordinary commercial activities going on, rely upon keeping secret for any length of time the location of such great pieces. It is a matter of art to conceal them; it is a matter of great precaution during hours of daylight to keep their places of concealment from becoming known. The whole business is something to take place after war is declared, rather than to burden commerce with an awkward attempt to control spies, who are necessarily beyond control so long as ordinary commercial activities go on.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator does not believe that we have any business to prepare for war until war is actually upon us?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Far from it, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. And that up to the very moment—— Mr. LEE of Maryland. The Senator from Missouri has not been listening to what I have been saying or he would not have made that remark.

Mr. REED. I am merely construing the Senator's own words. Mr. LEE of Maryland. I believe—and I think the Senator will believe if he thinks over it a little bit more—that the nakedness of this country, so far as military preparation is concerned, had better be agitated, and extensively agitated, by our people, and that any effort to conceal that nakedness from ourselves or to prevent criticism of our Military Establishment, when its insufficiency is known to all the world, is a great mistake for any patriot in this country to be a party to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course, nobody intends to stop people from agitating for more preparation; nobody has dreamed of that; but the position of the Senator from Maryland is that it is all right to buy guns, all right to buy ammunition, and all right to get ready, but that it is also all right to tell the enemy all about it, even when you stand in the very shadow of an impending conflict.

The point of difference between the Senator and myself is that I think when we reach a condition so dangerous that the President declares an emergency it is then time to begin getting ready and protecting ourselves against spies and against the giving out of dangerous information; and that it is not necessary to wait until the guns of the enemy are thundering at the gates of our cities.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk. I will say that some clerks for service in connection with the issuance of passports charge $1.50 and some charge $6. The amendment proposes to fix a uniform system of fees for this service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.
The Secretary. In chapter 4, section 1, page 12, line 8, after the word "passport," it is proposed to insert the following:

Clerks of the United States courts, agents of the Department of State, or other Federal officials who may be authorized to take passport applications and administer oaths thereon shall collect for all services in connection therewith a fee of $1, and no more, in lieu of all fees prescribed by any statute of the United States, whether the application is executed singly, in duplicate, or in triplicate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. I should like to know the object of that amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The fees charged for passports in this country run all the way from $1.50 to $6, and this is to make the charge uniform.

Mr. REED. Is that amendment germane to this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Very well, then; I have no objection to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It comes in on the passport section, and provides a uniform fee of $1 for a passport.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very glad, indeed, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] has directed our attention, in his usual persuasive way, to some of the features of this proposed legislation. It is possible that the scope and effect of section 1, of chapter 1, may be broader than it was the purpose of those who are responsible for framing the legislation desired or intended. In practical operation, I am very certain that no harm would come to the law-abiding citizen by reason of the bill if it took effect in the language in which it is now framed. There is, however, it might be said in perfect justice to those responsible for it, more or less ambiguity in the language found in lines 4 and 5, on page 1, "to which he is not lawfully entitled." The section recites—

That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled—

And so forth.

Then, Mr. President, it is, I feel sure, rather wider in its scope than it need be. It denounces as a criminal anyone who, "for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled, approaches, goes upon, or enters," among other places mentioned, any "building, office, or other place connected with the national defense." Of course, the office of the Secretary of War is a place connected with the national defense, and if one enters that office for the purpose of securing information concerning the national defense to which he is not entitled, he would become amenable to the penal provisions of this act. Now, some lady having a son among the troops upon the border and solicitous concerning his welfare, might easily enter the office of the Secretary of War and ask the Secretary of War when the soldiers were coming home from the border, and, of course, he would be obliged to say to her, "My dear madam, that is information to which you are not entitled, and I can not give it to you." Technically, and under the exact language of this bill, the lady would be guilty of a violation of the act. Of course, no one intended any such result at all. As I have said, I think the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled" are too ambiguous to be given a place in a penal statute.

I am going to propose a modification of the language in that respect, which will, I think, remove much of the objection urged against this section by the Senator from Iowa. I shall not ask consideration for the amendment this evening, but shall call for a consideration of it later in the history of the bill. I suggest that the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled," on page 1, lines 4 and 5, be stricken out, and that there be substituted instead the following: "without the permission, expressed or implied, of one lawfully entitled to give the same," so that the section shall read:

That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense, without the permission, expressed or implied, of one lawfully entitled to give the same, approaches, goes upon, or enters, flies over—

And so forth.

So that two things will be necessary: The one who does it must have permission, either expressed or implied, from one lawfully entitled to give it, and he must enter or go upon the place for the purpose of getting information concerning the national defense.

The conditions that surround the Mayflower have been adverted to. Her dock is within the confines of the navy yard. If the gates of the navy yard are swung wide open, of course that is an implied invitation to anyone to go through. If the gates are closed, one must, as a matter of course, get some express authority to go inside, or he becomes liable under the act.

Criticism has been made also, Mr. President, of subdivision (f) of section 1, chapter 1—a very just criticism to my mind. That subdivision received the careful consideration of the Judiciary Committee. I myself invited the attention of the committee to its provisions

Mr. OVERMAN. To what provision does the Senator refer:
Mr. WALSH. The provision at the bottom of page 3, extending over into page 4, subdivision (f) of section 1, chapter 1. was of the opinion that it ought to be stricken out of the bill; and I move now that it be stricken out. I was dissuaded from asking that action by the committee on the consideration that it was a privilege that perhaps would not be prized very highly by any citizen—the privilege of sending by post a communication written in invisible ink that could not be brought out except by applying heat or through some chemical action. It occurred to me that it might be made use of in these stressful times for the purpose of communicating to the enemy information concerning the national defense, which it would be unfortunate that they should receive; and inasmuch as it is, in the very nature of things, impossible for one to determine whether it is in its nature entirely innocuous or entirely harmful, the only way in which it could be reached at all would be to prohibit the communication altogether; but I am not satisfied that the practice is fraught with any such danger as to necessitate a specific provision of the character contained in the bill.

Another feature of the legislation is-

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has moved to strike out subdivision (f). Does he desire to have the question put on that motion now?

Mr. WALSH. Unless the chairman of the committee is desirous of disposing of the bill this evening, I would rather allow these suggested amendments to go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Iowa expects to offer some amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. President, I think it will be impossible to dispose of the bill to-night. I have certain amendments that I intend to propose to chapter 1, but I am not prepared to offer them at this time. I may say that, in a general way, the Senator from Montana has already anticipated two of them; but there are others. I believe that most of the offenses named in chapter 1 ought not to exist without an intent to injure our country or to aid another. That intent ought to be aptly expressed. Of course I do not mean that it ought to be phrased in the way I have just stated it, but that gives a general idea of my intention.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that is the Senator's idea. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hughes in the chair).

the Chair understand the Senator from Montana to say that he made a motion? The clerks at the desk so understood the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the motion of the Senator from Montana is the pending question before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I said likewise that I did not desire, unless the Senator in charge of the bill wished to dispose of the bill this evening, to have the amendments proposed by me now acted upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask that the amendments go over for the present. I desire to present some amendments relating to a different subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that the parliamentary situation may be clear the Chair will state that the metion of the Senator from Montana is now pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand, it is an amendment, not a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has moved to strike out subdivision (f) of section 1, chapter 1.

Mr. WALSH. I simply offer the amendment, not for action at this time.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that I am not in harmony with the view expressed just now by the Senator from Iowa. I do not think we ought to make the intent to do harm to the United States or to convey aid or comfort to the enemy an element in these crimes. We differ radically there, and I would not like to be understood that it is in any such spirit that these amendments tendered by myself are proposed.

Mr. President, we could very readily conceive that some enterprising newspaper man, some writer for the magazines, would go about to get this information without any purpose whatever to convey it to the enemy. He simply wants to do it for the enlightenment of the American people, as he believes, for their information, and perhaps his purpose does not go any further than to make a story that he can sell to some periodical. think that ought to be guarded in the way that this legislation seeks to guard it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I agree with the Senator from Montana in at least some respects. I think that in time of war a certain espionage or certain restrictions may be placed upon the rights of citizens that are not at all desirable in time of peace, and if we were in war I would not complain of proper restrictions being put upon the publication of information concerning our country in a great many things, and especially about the movements of our Army or Navy. But there is a great deal of this bill that is not confined to times of war. The particular paragraph in regard to newspapers, or the general publication of matters concerning the national defense, is confined to time of war; but, for instance, the first paragraph is not. It applies to time of peace. That offense may be committed at any time, and I can not believe that we ought to make it a criminal offense for persons to secure information respecting the national defense in time of peace, unless there is some evil intent in securing the information, unless it has some wrongful purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me illustrate a little further how the Senator from Iowa and myself differ with respect to I was called from the Chamber just 10 minutes ago by an old and very dear friend, who is a writer for the magazines. He is here in the city of Washington to-day for the purpose of finding out about anything with relation to which he could write an interesting story for publication in the magazines. Now, Mr. President, we are in peace at the present time, at war with no nation; but I can not conceive of a subject upon which he could write which would be read with more profound interest at the present time by everybody, or that would be more sensational in its character, than the exact location of the mines that there are supposed to be in New York Harbor; than the whole story of the preparation that has been made all up and down our coast to meet any possible enemy.

Mr. OVERMAN. The wire nets at Guantanamo, for instance. Mr. WALSH. To tell just exactly how many submarines we have, and just exactly where they are located, and just exactly how they are going to operate.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. War not being declared, and the ordinary channels of commerce and the movements of people in trade not being stopped, does the Senator believe for a moment that the main details in respect to the things that he has mentioned are not already in the possession of the spies of any possible enemy of this country?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not undertake to say. am yery sure that they have very much more information about this matter than we wish they had. But we are taking pains, by means of this legislation, to see that they do not get any more than we can avoid; that is all. We certainly ought to make it criminal upon their part at least to get the information, and, as I understand the Senator from Iowa, he does not object to that at all. So that the suggestion that foreign powers are already possessed of this information has no relevancy, as it seems to me, to the question that is before us, which is whether we ought not only to prevent those who seek to get it for the benefit of foreign nations, but those who seek to get it without any such purpose, but who, by disseminating it, would put it at the command of these people.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was not, as the Senator knows, discussing the publication of information. I was discussing at that moment the first paragraph "(a)" of chapter 1, which covers the effort to secure information. Now, I do not think that the Senator's friend ought to be regarded as a criminal because he attempts to secure that information. As to the location of mines, I do not know that there are any; but I take it that he would not ask the Senator from Montana the location of those mines, because I have an idea that he is just about as ignorant on that subject as I am. But suppose he goes to the Secretary of the Navy and asks for that information, and the Secretary of the Navy says, "I will not give it to you." Suppose he asks without any lawful authority, but simply because he wants the information, and tries to get it. Under this measure you would denounce him as a criminal.

When it comes to the publication of the information, if you want to extend the right of the President to suppress newspapers in time of peace, that is a distinct subject of itself, I think; and I do not know but that there are a good many things which I would be willing to put into the law that might curtail, to some extent, the freedom of the press. I am speaking now, however, about the effort of the American people, those who are not in official life at all, to secure information with regard to public affairs; because "the national defense" in fact embraces the whole field of public affairs, or may embrace that whole field.

Mr. WALSH. Just another feature, Mr. President. I understood the Senator likewise to object quite strenuously to a provision, found a number of times in the act, under which the President is authorized to use the Army and Navy for the purpose of preventing violations of the act and for apprehending any persons who may be guilty of a violation of them. That has been proposed as something in the nature of a departure in our legislation. It is suggested that legislation of that character vests the President of the United States with the power practically to declare war, because a vessel, for instance, violating any of the provisions of this act and seeking to escape would be fired upon, and that would constitute an act of war. But if that is the case, Mr. President, we have been occupying that field for, lo, these many years.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, right there, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly, Mr. OVERMAN. I call the Senator's attention to article 10 of The Hague International Peace Conference or treaty:

The fact of a neutral power resisting, even by force, attempts to violate its neutrality, can not be regarded as a hostile act.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there must be a great misconception somewhere in the minds of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from North Carolina. I did not say that it was a new departure. I offered yesterday an amendment to section 8 of that chapter which relates to embargoes upon arms and munitions of war. I have not even suggested any objection to the same power in other chapters of the act, although I think as to perhaps one other there is a just objection. But we have never yet attempted to confer upon the President of the United States the right to use the Army and Navy for any such purposes, I think, as are found in the chapter-I do not remember its number-to which I have referred.

For instance, I ask the Senator from Montana this question: In the first place, Congress has to authorize the President to proclaim an embargo before he has the authority to do it. It has nothing whatever to do with neutral rights or our obligations to any nation. It is simply a matter as to our own policy. Suppose that Congress should give the President authority to establish an embargo against the exportation of arms and munitions to Canada. The embargo is properly established. A carload of arms or munitions, however, escapes the watchfulness of the officials in charge of such matters, crosses the St. Lawrence River, and is in Montreal. Does the Senator from Montana believe that we ought to authorize the President to lead an army into Canada for the purpose of recapturing the carload of munitions that had passed into that Dominion?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, that is just exactly what you do in this chapter, if I understand it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa in that construction of it. I think it would be a forced construction to give to the statute to say that it means that we intended to empower the President of the United States to invade a country with which we are at peace by either the Army or the Navy.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is to restrict the President in that respect that I have offered the amendment. I will speak upon it when the time comes, and I think I can convince the Senator from Montana that that is the interpretation which must be placed upon the act, disassociating that interpretation entirely from any suggestion that a President of the United States would do the thing; but I say that that is what we attempt to authorize

Mr. WALSH. I should hardly think so. Of course, I was not able to be present at all times during the discussion of this subject by the Senator from Iowa. I was referring to some comments that he made in relation to section 8 of chapter 9, appearing upon page 24 of the bill, as follows:

The President of the United States is authorized and empowered to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this chapter.

It was in reference to whatever the Senator from Iowa said concerning that section that I have spoken; and I understood him to take the position that that section authorized the President of the United States to declare war or to precipitate

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WALSH. And that it was a departure in our legislation, something that had never before been heard of. Of course, if the Senator does not take that position-

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is partly right. It is to that section that my remarks were directed yesterday, and it is to that section that I offered an amendment which I withdrew for the purpose of reframing it. The general purport of the amendment was to declare that the section shall not be construed to authorize the President to commit an act of war. As I now have it, it is that it shall not be construed to authorize the President to use the Army and Navy beyond the territorial limits of the United States to commit an act of war against a nation with which we are then at peace.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to a precedent for this legislation as old as 1838, an act under which the President of the United States was authorized to employ the land and naval forces of the country, and it was not deemed necessary to put into that act a stipulation that he should not invade the territory of a country with which we were at peace. I read from page 214 of the fifth United States Statutes at Large, an act approved March 10, 1838, which contains the following language:

That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation, and to enforce the due execution, of this act, and the act hereby amended.

Now let me remark, Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. What was the act? I am not familiar with it. Mr. WALSH. The act, Mr. President, was passed in view of the threatened invasion of Canada, as it will be recalled, about that time, by forces from this side of the international boundary line. It is entitled:

An act supplementary to an act entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned," approved April 20, 1818.

It provides for the seizure of any vehicles or any vessel or any arms going across the border pursuant to a conspiracy hatched in this country to overturn the Government of Canada.

I also call attention to an act older than that, dating from I read from the fifth volume, Federal Statutes, annotated-

Mr. CUMMINS. May I comment for a moment on the act to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is very plain that the President's authority under that act was limited to things done within the territorial limits of the United States. In the act to which I have offered my amendment, as I understand it, there are provisions for the execution of whatever power we have beyond the territorial limits of the United States. I have no objection to the use of the Army and Navy within our own territorial limits. My objection is to the use beyond our own jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly the Senator could find no authority in the language to which I have called his attention at page 24 of the bill which is not likewise found in the act of 1838, for the language is identical.

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely on the nature of the offense that is to be punished or the nature of the act which is to be prevented. It was said yesterday very emphatically— I think the Senator from Montana was absent-that if, for instance, a ship escaped, having received clearance from our ports and having gone upon the high seas, possibly having reached a foreign port, and it being discovered that it had carried arms or munitions contrary to the proclamation of embargo, it was expected that our warships would pursue the ship, and no matter where she might be found, capture her and return her to the port from which she sailed.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see how possibly a court could ever give any construction of that character to the act. It clearly means that she may be seized within our territorial waters or that she may be seized on the high seas.

The next statute which I am going to call to your attention is just that kind of a case in which the President is authorized to pursue any vessel leaving our waters without the requisite permission and to use the Army and Navy to seize and capture that vessel and bring her back; but no one ever thought he had the right to invade the territorial waters of another State to do it.

It dates from 1818, and is quoted in the fifth volume of Federal Statutes, annotated at page 376, and reads as follows:

It shall be lawful for the President, or such person as he shall empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart the United States in all cases in which, by the laws of nations or the treatles of the United States, she ought not to remain within the United States.

That was not construed as authorizing the President to follow the vessel across into her home waters or into the waters of some neutral nation and there seize her.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe the President ought to use the Navy on the high seas for that purpose; but the Senator from Montana will differ with me in regard to that.

I do differ very decidedly. Mr. WALSH.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, aside from that, the Senator from Montana agrees with me in regard to the matter. Our only disagreement is that, in his opinion, the amendment is not neces-

Mr. WALSH. Quite so, except that I was misled apparently into the belief that the Senator reached the conclusion that the use of the Army and Navy for the purposes in our own territorial waters or upon the high seas would be a grant of power to the President of the United States to declare war.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I think the Senator from Iowa had in mind some observations made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Fall] upon that subject. I do not understand that the Senator from New Mexico contended that the vessel could be pursued into the waters of another country or another State. I think his idea was that the vessel could be pursued and captured, if possible, upon the high seas, but beyond that I do not think he meant to go.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may have misunderstood him. I have not read his speech since it was published, but I understood him to say that it would enable us to go into the interior of a foreign country and take the arms and munitions from the person to whom they had been delivered and return them to the United States; but I may be wrong about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer some amendments which do not change the substance at all, but merely the punctuation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 9, insert a comma after the word "to" and before the word "communicate"; on page 7, line 8, strike out the comma after the word "chapter"; on page 1, line 1, abbreviate "Section" to "Sec."; on page 18, line 7, insert a comma after the word "in"; and on page 38, line 1, insert the article "a" before the word "description."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR DRAINAGE OPERATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from North Carolina to yield to me for a moment to get consent to call up a bill which is of pressing and great importance not only to the people in my State, but elsewhere? It proposes to give people interested in drainage operations the same right of way across Government lands that those engaged in irrigation operations have. It just adds the word "drainage" after "irrigation" in the irrigation act. The bill was up the last time we considered the calendar, but on account of a mistake in the report it went over. I had it recommitted at once, and since then it has been reported by the committee and is again on the calendar. Those who found some criticism with the form of the bill before I think are entirely satisfied with it now. I know the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] objected to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title. The Secretary. A bill (S. 7710) to amend the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095), section 18, and to amend section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stat., 404).

Mr. FLETCHER. It will not take two minutes to pass the I do not think anyone will object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CATRON. I object.

Mr. FLETCHER. Who makes the objection, may I ask? Mr. CATRON. I object.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that at the close of the session to-day the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to have a short executive session that some nominations may be referred and that others may be placed on the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make that motion. I dislike to make the point of no quorum, but I object to an executive session to-night.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I simply want to have some nominations referred and others that are ready to be put on the calendar placed there. I do not want any action taken on them at all. It will take only about two minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. It is just to allow reports of nominations to be made and placed on the calendar?

Mr. BANKHEAD. And references made. That is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that,

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Saturday, February 17, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Sunday, February 18, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m 11 o'clock a. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19410) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. Townsend as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 12463. An act for the relief of Meredith G. Corlett, a citizen and resident of Williamson County, Tenn.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 6850. An act authorizing the transfer of certain retired

Army officers to the active list; and

S. 7872. An act to confirm and ratify the sale of the Federal building site at Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, and for other

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, and Mr. LEWIS

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19410) be printed with the Senate amendments numbered. If there is no objection, I will be glad if the House would send this bill to conference and disagree to the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. How many requests is the gentleman making at once?

Two or three of them, but I will divide them. Mr. MOON. [Laughter.] The first is that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I believe that will be done without request under the practice.

Mr. MOON. That is true, but it is not always done.

The SPEAKER. That will be done.

Mr. MANN. I was going to say that I did not think it was desirable

Mr. MOON. And then I ask that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and that the conferees be appointed.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is desirable, Mr. Speaker, to take action on the Senate amendments until we have had them printed, and certainly not before Tuesday in any event.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want a time fixed?

I do not think it is possible to take action on Mr. MANN. these amendments before they are printed, and I do not think it is possible to take action before Tuesday.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker. Let the matter go over until Tuesday. I thought it might be dis-posed of this morning, but if there is objection to it, let it go over until Tuesday. I just ask that the bill be held on the Speaker's table. We can take it up later.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS HOUSE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one hour on the general subject of this bill.

The SPEAKER. On the general subject of what? Mr. LEWIS. On the general subject of the military bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent, before the House goes into committee, to address the House for one hour on the Army bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It will not take very long to determine whether unanimous consent will be given.

The SPEAKER. It will not take half a minute to dispose of this other matter, either.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Pending that request, I ask unanimous consent to have considered a resolution which I would like to have read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania objecting to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I do not object, but I make this request. It can be quickly determined. I do not want to take the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] off his feet. This matter can be determined in a few minutes. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Congressional Record of February 9, 1917, pages 3220—3221, contained a statement by the Hon. Oscar Callaway, Member of Congress from Texas, charging that "the J. P. Morgan interests" and others had engaged certain persons "to purchase the policy, national and international" of certain newspapers in the matter "of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy, and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes" and for "the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served":

**Resolved** That the Sneaker of the House of Parageontations as and the states are the served ":

and for "the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served":

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives appoint a select committee of seven Members of the House, with instructions to inquire into the charges made in the printed statement of the said Hon. Oscar Callaway, Member of Congress from Texas, as inserted by him in the Congressional Record of February 9, 1917, pages 3220-3221, respecting an alleged arrangement by "the J. P. Morgan interests" and others to engage certain persons "to purchase the policy, mational and international" of certain newspapers in the matter "of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy, and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes," and for "the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served," and such other matters as relate to the preparation, transmission, dissemination, or control, by advertisement or otherwise, of false or misleading information concerning the preparedness of the Army and Navy of the United States, or the suppression of truthful information in newspapers, magazines, or other publications, or as to other matters affecting the neutrality of the United States in its relations with foreign countries or tending to disturb the peace of the United States; and to make effective such inquiry the select committee herein authorized shall have power to enforce the attendance of persons in Washington or elsewhere, to administer oaths to such persons, and to require the production of such books and papers as may be pertinent to the inquiry; and to pay the expenses of such committee the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any unexpended balance in the Treasury.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection myself to that resolution. I object only to its being called up at the present time. I shall object to its consideration

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that certain responsible newspapers have demanded an investigation of this matter, and it seems important, in the interest of honest journalism in the United States, that the charges made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Callaway] should be investigated. Inasmuch as there is but a very brief time between now and adjournment of Congress, it is evident that the resolution should be acted upon immediately.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Does not the gentleman believe that this House has already wasted enough of the people's money in making investigations of charges that have no foundation whatever?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. The House has been very wasteful, I fear, in making other investigations; but this is an important matter, affecting not only the dignity of the House but the welfare of the country, and no committee should be expected to undertake to make an investigation of this kind at its own expense.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the gentleman any inside information to base this upon except newspaper reports?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have the word of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Callaway] that he can prove the state-ments made by him in the Record. I am not making the charges. I am asking an investigation of the charges made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Callaway], who states that he has proof of these charges.

Mr. ADAIR. A few weeks ago we had the assurance of a gentleman by the name of Lawson that he could prove his own charges, and we investigated them, and now the taxpayers will

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That investigation developed some things that are of interest to the country and that certain information came from very high sources

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I do not disagree with the statements contained in the resolution, but I do not think it ought to displace the consideration of this bill, and I therefore shall have to object to unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the gentleman's thought—that it should be brought up on Monday?

Mr. DENT. I shall not have anything to do with the control of the calendar on Monday. I understand the debate will go over until Tuesday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of decent journalism, which asks for an investigation, I make the request. If it is objected to, I can not prevent that.

Mr. DENT. I object, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' ASSOCIATION REUNION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 157, giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the re-anion of the Confederate Veterans' Association, to be held in the District of Columbia in the year 1917, and for other purposes incident to said encampment. I do not believe it will take many minutes to consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker lays before the House the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157).

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc.. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to make such special regulations for the occasion of the reunion of the Confederate Veterans' Association, which will take place in the District of Columbia in the year 1917, as they shall deem advisable for the preservation of public order and the protection of life and property, to be in force one week prior to said encampment, during said encampment, and one week subsequent thereto. Such special regulations shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers of the District of Columbia, and no penalty prescribed for the violation of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication; and said commissioners are authorized and directed to establish a special schedule of fares applicable to public conveyances in said District during the period aforesaid. Any person violating any of the aforesaid regulations or the aforesaid schedule of fares shall, upon conviction thereof in the police court of the said District, be liable for such offense to a fine not to exceed $100, and in default of payment of such fine imprisonment in the workhouse or jail of said District for not longer than 60 days. This resolution shall take offect immediately upon its approval, and the sum of $11,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and from the revenues of the District of Columbia in equal parts, is hereby appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry out the provisions of section 1 of this joint resolution, $1,000 of which shall be available for the construction, maintenance, and operation of public comfort stations and information booths, under the direction of said commissioners.

Sec. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are visions of section 1 of this joint resolution, $1,000 of which shall be available for the construction, maintenance, and operation of public confort senters and information booths, under the direction of sale confort senters.

Sec. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on Illumination of the citizens' executive committee for the entertainment of the Confederate Veterans' Association to stretch suitable conductors, with sufficient supports wherever necessary, for the purpose of effecting the said illumination within the District of Columbia: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents that supports, be fully and alicity remote from the streets and wrenues of the said city of Washington on or before 10 days after said reunien: Provided jurther, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the public; and that the pavenent of any street, avenue, or alley disurbed is replaced in as good condition are taken for the protection of the public; and that the pavenent of any street, avenue, or alley disurbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein anthorized: Provided purther, That no expension of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia; And provided jurther, That if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illumination purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia; and part of the Said control of the Commission of the confederate Veterans' Association, 1917, such of the United States or the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized to loan to the chairman of the subcommittee of a said wires shall be under the supervision of the United States as in their judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the reunion. The loan of the said ensign

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this being a joint resolution that would require consideration in Committee of the Whole, I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House, not in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House in lieu of in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House. Is there objection to that?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Johnson of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

MEDAWAKANTON AND WAHPAKOOTA (SANTEE) SIOUX INDIANS,

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a further conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on Senate bill 135.

Mr. KEATING. What is the bill? Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863. Members of the House will remember that the matter was before the House a few days ago. There is a division between the House and Senate which seems to be irreconcilable, but I ask for a further conference.

Mr. MANN. We passed the Senate bill with a House amendment. Have not the Senate asked for a conference?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand so. The bill is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Senate asks for a conference. Now, the gentleman from Texas asks to take this bill from the Speaker's table and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. s there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. Carter of Oklahoma, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. NORTON.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to address the House for one-half hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one-half hour on the Army appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say to the gentleman from Maryland asking time on the bill that I had already agreed to give away all the time I had at my disposal. Much to the regret, I am sure, of the entire membership the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] will not be a Member of the House after the 4th of March, and under these circumstances I will not object to one-half hour being used by the gentleman, but I shall have to object to any further requests as long as this bill is under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Lewis] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, we are now launched into militarism. It is not our fault. The world's events are responsible. A generation ago our military expenditures were small. when this measure, with its sister measure, the Navy bill, shall have passed, this Government will be on a more expensive military footing than perhaps any Government before the war. And yet in modern times war, apart from its inhumanity, has lost all its logic. Centuries ago it might have promised a gambler's chance of gain to the victor. He could profit if he won. He could make slaves of the conquered population, confiscate their property, and work them unpaid. But this is all past. Human nature does change, you see. He can not enslave the vanquished, and he can only confiscate public property, such as roads, streets, courthouses, schools. But since he has to maintain these when he takes them, there is no advantage even in confiscation. In modern times this has also proven true of colonial conquest. There is not a colony which confers any business advantage on the governing country. We know that of our colonies. Rather, they are a bill of expense, and just a fearful anxiety. England knows this, too. Not one of her citizens has been made a shilling richer by her territorial acquisitions. During the jubilee an English beggar on the streets of London was heard to say:

I own Canada, the Australias, colonies in Africa, and the islands of the far Pacific, and here I am, starving for a crust of bread. I am a citizen of the greatest power of the modern world, and all people should how to my greatness. But yesterday I asked alms of a negro savage, and he repulsed me with disgust.

Two years of war have cost Great Britain and Germany, Austria and Russia each enough treasure to thrice rebuild their railways—three generations of toil. War—it is a cheat as well as a crime.

ANARCHISM CAUSE OF WAR.

But, you ask, if war is unprofitable, grossly unprofitable, if it the stroctous and inhuman besides, why is it still resorted to? This question brings us to the real and responsible cause of war, to the cause of this war. What was its cause? My answer is that it was international anarchy, the absence of government in the community of nations, primarily in the relations of Austria and Serbia, then its absence generally in the international relations of the neutral and warring nations of the world.

Why is it that Governments themselves organized to preserve public order are themselves the chief offenders against public order? I call your attention now to something thoroughly kindergarten, it is true, but apparently, although kindergarten, essential to be expressed and emphasized in the present situation of our country and the world.

Public peace and order are institutional products in this world. They do not exist as a mere growth of sentiment and noble purpose. They exist, wherever they exist, as the result of a certain kind of institution, and that institution is government. I call the attention of the House—it is hardly necessary-to the fact that in every community where peace and order obtains you have government. The township has peace and order. It has government. The county has peace and order. It has government. The State, as a community, has peace and order. It also has government. And finally, the great interstate community in which we live, the country of Washington, has peace and order, because it, too, has a government to procure it.

But when we come to the international community, where nations meet as individuals meet in the domestic community and have the same complexity of relations, what do you find? You find a state of indescribable disorder at this very moment, but you also find a community without a government. We are citizens in our domestic communities, but in the international community we are simply anarchists. I use that expression not as an epithet but as a term of description, for anarchism means nothing more or less than the absence of government in a public community.

Mr. Speaker, schoolboys will ask the question why it is that every community has a government except the international community alone. And their histories will answer, "Every government has been built by the sword, and because no conqueror's sword was long enough or strong enough to build a world government, government now stops, and the public order with it, at the national boundaries and the ocean's edge." THE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE.

Sir, much discussion has taken place recently of measures designed to prevent future wars, and among these is the League to Enforce Peace. The provisions of the plan are:

(a) That the nations agree to submit their justiciable differences to an arbitration tribunal for decision. (Only a portion of the contentions between nations are regarded as "justici-

(b) Other questions, e. g., privileges of immigration, which are nonjusticiable in character, to be submitted to a conciliation tribunal for recommendation,

(c) For one year, awaiting such decision or recommendation, neither party to the controversy shall make war upon the other.

(d) That neither party shall be bound by the decision, but if either nation shall fail to give such preliminary year of truce and commit an act of war, then-

The other nations shall make war upon it.

(f) Existing international law may be amended at conferences of the nations, and be binding if no nation dissents to such amendment.

All of which means that war is proposed to be avoided only by "unanimous consent." The laws can only be enacted by unanimous consent; the decisions of the arbitral tribunal are effective only by consent of the parties to the controversy; the castigation of the offending nation is to be left to the 41 other nations in the trust that they will unanimously join in executing the punitive program. All of which, I repeat, means that war is to be discontinued only by "unanimous consent."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that no arbitration award of international disputes has ever been disregarded, and is not such more to be desired and easier obtained than a scheme of international government?

With all respect to the gentleman's view of the matter, I fear that when the world's publicists come to analyze the plan, it presents so many novel elements, so many elements of uncertainty that conservative men will instinctively prefer the other alternative, namely, a full-fledged government. They know what government does. They know how government does They understand government perfectly. But as to any newfangled schemes, a league to enforce peace-not a league to enforce law-for example, nobody knows what it may mean; and it probably would not mean as much as the Articles of Confederation which preceded our Constitution.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption and a question?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do. Mr. SLAYDEN. I am much interested in the gentleman's address, with the greater part of which I am in hearty agreement. I believe that I know his great purpose in advancing this argument. He is inspired by love for his fellow men and sympathy with them in their troubles. He wants to promote international peace, to banish wars and their cruelties from the face of the earth forever more. But why not follow the line of least resistance? Why undertake so impossible a task as a world government, with legislative, judicial, and executive functions, and its necessary surrender of sovereignty by the individual governments, when experience suggests that universal peace may be secured by a simpler device and one that will involve no such national sacrifice? The gentleman knows that no international arbitral award has ever been disregarded, and we have had them for a hundred years or more. Why not, under these circumstances, try a world court of arbitration and, if you please, a world court for justiciable questions? Enough countries have already, at one time or another, assented to such a plan to encourage us to believe that it can be had without much more delay, and it has established its efficiency in the peaceful adjustment of many international disputes.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is entitled to his opinions about the lines of least resistance. We have no way to decide that point. But about arbitration, let us see. When arbitration works, it works. But voluntary arbitration did not work for the Boer War, the Spanish-American War, the Russo-Japanese War, nor yet the present war. Ex-President Taft is the principal sponsor of this plan, and his present activities for world order make him illustrious, if nothing else had. If the Blaines and the Clevelands, if the Bismarcks and the Gladstones had so done their duty in their generation so it might have been. Now, Mr. Taft proposes to make the submission of controversies compulsory, through a treaty among the nations of the world. His object is my object—the securing of public order in the international community. But his plan, like any mere arbitration plan, is only a rope of sand. It may, indeed, comport with some men's ideas of the "lines of least resistance" in world politics, but its analysis of the nature of the subject matter is so very inadequate as to offer us only a chateau en Espagne.

The international community does not differ from the domestic community in the ingredients or requirements for securing public order; and we all know an arbitration scheme would not suffice for a domestic community. Nations meet in the international community just as individuals meet in the domestic community. They also are liable to have their cross-purposes and misunderstandings just like individuals. So the international community does not differ from the domestic community in the ingredients and requirements producing public order. What are they?

First. Rules of conduct, specific laws, defining the rights and duties of the parties, provided in advance, and which, being clearly understood, thus avoid nearly all potential controversies.

Second. A judiciary to decide disputed cases of law or fact, not responsible for the merits or demerits of the law, and without power to change it to suit particular cases, thus making its application wholly impersonal.

Third. Last and least, the police power, an officer with no discretion except to enforce the law.

These three elements render the social law like a law of nature, a mechanical or a chemical law, because if it exists in advance the subject, knowing its meaning before he acts, can harmonize his conduct to it; and if it befalls him to have misunderstood, not his possible enemy, but an impartial institution, adjudicates the dispute, while an impartial agency will certainly call upon him for obedience to its decrees.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the gentleman to say there would still be instances that could not be settled by this tribunal

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. I was speaking of the League to Enforce Peace. Only justiciable causes are adjudicable. Nonjusticiable causes—that is, cases for which existing international rules supply no regulation; the gaps in international law, so to speak—would be referred to a conciliation board, with power to give advice only to the contending parties.

Now, my answer to the gentleman from Texas is that all of these elements of formal law have been found preessential to the maintenance of public order in domestic communities. An arbitration tribunal gives none of them. The rules of conduct, worked out in such elaborate detail, for our domestic relations; the court with processes so various as to fit all our individual relations, and compulsory processes, too, and the police power, all acting in complete coordination to achieve the objects of preserving security and public order; none of these, I say, are within the reach of the arbitration method. That the plan proposed is deficient in these respects is seen if it be but applied as a preventive to the existing war. (a) There were no rules of conduct, international law, that an arbitration tribunal could have applied to punish the alleged Serbian conspirators. extraterritorial crime committed was not therefore a justiciable cause. Well, then, as a last resort, what could the second tribunal of conciliation have done? It could have delayed the matter, it is urged for a year, giving the passions time to cool. But suppose they did not cool Few people believe this method would have sufficed. Europe was headed for "der tag" as the inevitable consequence of ambitions formed and purposes conceived, in a community where anarchism gave no nation rights that were indubitable, or duties that were adequately defined.
(b) But suppose the tribunal had pronounced a decision or made a recommendation unsatisfactory to one of the parties, or even to both them, what then? Its decision could not be enforced, says the plan. And so we are where we begun, anarchy and still more anarchy.

Mr. Speaker, of course, an arbitration tribunal is not a court, and can not do service for one. Said Prof. Seeley 70 years ago:

We have a problem of federation before us and not merely of constituting a law court. The law court is not only historically found invariably within the State, but it also takes all its character and efficiency from the State. It is a matter of demonstration that a State is implied in a law court, and as a necessary consequence, that an international law court implies an international state. The nations of Europe must therefore constitute themselves into some sort of federation, or the international court can never come into existence. Judges can not constitute themselves, and a judicial assembly is inconceivable without a legislative assembly of some kind executing its sentences.

Real law is the formula product of political government. The Real law is the formal product of political government. The legislative, judicial, and executive functions are complementary, the flesh, blood, and bone of effective law. I despair of the plan that offers but one or two of them. We must have the rule of conduct first, to know what we should do; second, the judge to say what should be done, when the facts or law are disputed; and third, the force, for the rare personality that respects neither rule nor judge. Experience with domestic institutions shows that a definite rule of conduct operates to prevent controversy in nearly all cases; that the judge's decision is efficacious alone in the rest, except for an infinitesimal number, where the sheriff's club is required. Why should the experience be different in international affairs, if a precise and obligatory rule of conduct has been provided in advance? If I were compelled to choose from the disjecta membra of government but one of its members instead of all three, I should take the first, namely, the "rule of conduct," as most efficacious. If the "rule of conduct" were present, so that nations could clearly see how to avoid offending, or if still offending, precise rules were at hand by which to identify their offense, something might be expected of the coercive power of a public opinion, shared by all the world. Meanwhile what sound hope can we have for a mere arbitration tribunal, with no rules (or insufficient rules) of conduct, prescribed in advance? Its judgments must be in the nature of ex post facto, or retrospective lawmaking, and thus deter submission of causes or incite recalcitrancy to the disappointing decision. And what confidence could be placed in the operation of an executive force left to 40 different States, each to determine whether it would lend it or not? "Enforced peace" its sponsors call it. In all sincerity, what is that? I understand "enforced law." I will entrust my life and my property to it. But "enforced peace," who would prefer to commit his own life or his own property to such a Robbin Goodfellow to such a Will of the Wish as that? fellow, to such a Will of the Wisp as that?

What is this "arbitration" but more executory agreements for the interested diplomats to construe and break, as heretofore? Surely, the world has exhausted its faith in the sufficiency of the promises of diplomats. Says Seeley again:

In order to be really vigorous and effectual such a system absolutely requires a federation of the closer kind; that is, a federation not after the model of the late German Bund, but after the model of the United States, a federation with a complete apparatus of powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—and raised above dependence upon State government. AN INTERNATIONAL PEDERATION.

Is it not a government for the international community that we need? Then why waste our opportunity on new and doubtful substitutes when the institutions thoroughly tried out in analogous situations are at hand?

Mr. EMERSON. How would the gentleman have the international legislature constituted?

Mr. LEWIS. I should follow the Constitution of the United States, redrafted as the Constitution of the United Sovereign With the elimination of a few hundred words from its clauses and as many words added here and there it would serve to bring them the same orderly progression and security it has given our own sovereign States.

When the American Colonies threw off their adhesion to the British Empire they were 13 sovereign States, with all the extraterritorial relations implied in the international status, includ-ing the power to make treaties and to make war. The Federal Constitution, which provides an interstate or international government, was designed to cover these international or interstate relations, which, be it noticed, were much more numerous because of their contiguity than those we encounter among the historical nations of the world. But the inducing causes for the American Union were hardly as great as those calling now for international

The problems then and now to me seem quite identical. There is the program of substituting law for anarchy in interstate intercourse, the protection of State boundaries, and sovereignty in local affairs, the conquering of the fear by the smaller State that the larger one would seize the international government and misuse it, the fear of the larger State that artful combinations of smaller States would strip it of its prestige or graft upon its prosperity. These fears were overcome. By splitting the legislative organization into two sections, the Senate representing the States as sovereigns, the House their people according to numbers, these disparities have been equalized and State apprehensions wholly dissipated. How does this problem differ then and now?

The fear of violation of boundaries or absorption of the powers of the State by the federation were presented. They were met by guaranties—and those guaranties have been effective, we say.

How does this problem differ then and now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But if there were questions of sovereignty raised by the individual nations, would it not require as much armament as each nation requires at the present time?

Mr. LEWIS. Well, that problem hardly differed then and now. The danger and fear of individual State militarism was there. It was met by the Constitution with a provision that no State shall without the consent of Congress keep troops or ships of var in time of peace * * * or engage in war unless actually war in time of peace * or engage in war unless actually invaded." and the State militia should be subject to Federal command. Disarmament established in a line. How does this problem differ then and now? Especially, how does it differ if the federation should acquire by purchase the existing armaments and military implements of the nations to execute its own laws, guaranteeing defensive protection to the respective member States?

Does not experience indicate that the promulgation of the rules of conduct and the obvious guaranties, such as the prohibition of invasion of one State by another and Federal noninterference in internal affairs of the States, would prove the end of international controversies. Practically this is the result that has followed the like guaranties under our Constitution.

Mr. BORLAND. I am very much interested in the parallel the gentleman is drawing between his proposed plan and the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman is aware that the Constitution had to withstand the shock of the argument that the arrangement between the States was simply a league by treaty and was not a consolidation into an indissoluble Nation. That is one question I would like to have the gentleman address himself to,

Mr. LEWIS. Well, with regard to the idea, and the former argument, that our Union was only a league between States: It may have been so designed; it certainly was primarily an international government for 13 independent States, but in a century it has developed such solidarity of spirit and interest as to have evolved from an international into a national form of government, to a substantial extent. There are many national things-indeed, most national things-it can not even now do, and may never do, that still remain with the States. Its primary purpose was to abolish struggle and possible war between our States. Virginia and Maryland had as much to quarrel about as other nations. Most people think it has now permanently succeeded. I quote a pertinent paragraph from Prof. Seelev:

In spite of their one internal war the American Union may be said to have solved the problem of abolishing war, and we may see there the model which Europe should imitate in her international relations. Now, this great triumph of the Union was achieved on the very ground upon which an earlier Confederation had conspicuously failed in the same undertaking; and a comparison of the two federations shows that where the Federal organization was lax, and decisively disentangled from the State organizations, the federation failed; it succeeded when the Federal bond was strengthened.

Now, supposing the federation to embrace all three elements of government, i. e., the legislative, the judicial, and the executive functions, what legislative powers should be granted this international government? I suggest the following as necessary to prevent war:

- (a) To guarantee the inviolability of national boundaries and protect them from invasion by any sovereign State.
- (b) To punish individuals for extraterritorial offenses against State or its citizens.
- (c) To substitute interstate laws for treaties, secure equal rights upon the seas, and exercise exclusive jurisdiction over treaties.
- (d) To purchase existing national armament and military implements, and limit the armed force permissible to any State to its domestic needs of peace and order.

(e) The power of taxation for these ends and the right to maintain an army and navy.

It is submitted that such powers exercised in a governmental way would be effective to prevent war among the States, members of the Union. To promote the progress of the world and invest the new Government with a continuous life activity, I should add:

(f) Power to make laws concerning all the merely international relations of the States and their citizens.

(g) Extradition and navigation regulations.(h) Uniform laws on commercial paper, etc.

(i) To coin money, fix weights and measures, establish international posts, patent regulations, and copyrights.

The principal changes necessary in our Federal Constitution to effect these objects are thought to be:

The selection of the two Senators from each State by the authority which now appoints ambassadors.

The selection of the representatives, one for each 10,000,000 of population, by the legislature, no State to have less than two.

The election of President and Vice President according to

The election of President and vice President according to the original plan provided in our Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman is making a fine argument, to which most of us can agree. Will the gentleman discuss the manner of enforcing the decrees of this trib-

Mr. LEWIS. The way of enforcing judgments and decrees would be just what you know here. You would have a Federal legislature constituted from among the member nations as our legislature is constituted from the States, the Senate representing the sovereigns and the House representing their populations. You would have courts like ours to enforce its enactments. Its laws would bear directly upon the citizens and subjects of the member nations just as ours do on ours. I quote Prof. Seeley:

The special lesson which is taught by the experience of the Americans is that the decrees of the federation must not be handed over for execution to the officials of the separate States, but that the federation must have an independent and separate Executive, through which its authority must be brought to bear directly upon individuals. The individual must be distinctly conscious of his obligation to the federation and of his membership in it; all federations are mockerles that are mere understandings between Governments.

With regard to any nation not joining the union-the federation-we should bear the same relations to it a nation does now.

In addition to our Bill of Rights, of which little need be changed, a guaranty of noninterference with the import and export tariff laws of the States should be added. And there should be a distinct statement that the citizens of the different States should be citizens of the union of sovereign States as well and owe its allegiance to make its laws operate directly upon them. Thus sovereign States would not be the offenders if offenses were committed. The citizens directly concerned would be the offending parties, and be denied the shelter of an intervening State authority. The constitution, treaties, and acts of the congress would be the supreme law, as in the United States

Mr. BORLAND. Our Constitution provides that each State, members of the Union, shall be guaranteed a republican form of government. In other words, it makes uniformity, homogeneity in the local government of the different States. That is another question to which I would like the gentleman to address himself.

Mr. LEWIS. Answering the gentleman, I should say that that guaranty would be plainly inapplicable and even unnecessary for the purpose of the federation. And with respect to the homogeneity of which the distinguished gentleman speaks: While I think it highly fortunate that we possess it for our domestic purposes, I do not consider that mere homogeneity of political institutions in the member States of the proposed federation is essential, or that its absence would affect an international structure any more than it now does the treaty-making power. The domestic institutions, the domestic life and history of the member States would not concern the federation in any institutional way. International subjects, important as they are, are really few in number.

Let us notice, for comparison's sake, what the task of the international lawmaker would be. Now, the generic subjects of international law are very few. Beginning with "Piracy," of which war is now about the only analogy, we have National boundaries, protection of.

Navigation regulations.

Passports.

Fisheries, and so forth.

International posts.

Minatory armament, and so forth.

Neutrality.

Extraterritorial crimes.

Belligerency, capture, and so forth. Compared with the volume of domestic law, it is easy to see that this field is actually inconsiderable. And yet only a few of even these subjects are such as to require, peremptorily, the exercise of international rather than national government; that is, but a few of them have produced contentions resulting in war. tional boundaries, colonization, extraterritorial crimes, captures, and perhaps minatory armament, so far are the subjects for which treaty lawmaking and diplomatic adjudication have proved inadequate.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. One of the great difficulties in carrying on the Austra Hungarder Commencent in the discretize of the the Austro-Hungarian Government is the diversity of language to be found among the peoples of those two nations. What does the gentleman think of a Congress composed of all the nations of the world with a multiplicity of languages?

Mr. LEWIS. It would present difficulties, but mainly difficulties of speech. The present international situation presents impossibilities, regarded from any standpoint of human nature.

[Applause.]

But I should not seem to dispose of this difficulty too curtly. It is, in my judgment, a difficulty, but only a provisional difficulty. A number of parliaments have already encountered it, and successfully. Provision can, apparently, be made to over-come it, even should it be necessary to ask that the legislator be acquainted with a language or two besides his own. The Austrian, Chinese, and, I think, the Swiss, Parliaments manage to overcome these lingual difficulties now. A record printed in three or four languages-well, print paper is high, but so is the cost of war, or even preparedness.

INITIATORY CONDITIONS.

How many nations should enter such federation to make it effective? Two minimum alternatives are proposed:

The eight great powers are Austria-Hungary, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Russia, and the United States. First, its acceptance by a majority of the sovereign States, if the majority include any six of the above powers.

Second, its acceptance by any two-thirds of the sovereign States of the world.

The number of sovereign States, sending and receiving ambassadors, appears to be forty-three.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman think that if a group of the greater powers were to enter into such a federation the moral effect would be to draw the remaining States in when they began to see the benefits which resulted to the domestic and foreign status of the member States, such as the reduction in the burden of armament and of the establishment of fortified frontiers, and the closer commercial, social, and intellectual intercourse, and so forth?

Mr. LEWIS. I think that would be inevitable. It happened here. All the smaller States, it is thought, would welcome an order of things guaranteeing their territorial and domestic inor three States are now possibly ambitious for territorial aggrandizement, but this appetite is chiefly active during war. I do not think any of the European States would decline a union simply to save a possible chance of successful territorial con-

The pride of kings—would that deter some of the great powers? Before the war, perhaps yea. An authority external to their own they might have resented. But fearfully chastened by their present experience, I think it reasonable to hope that any such personal vanity has disappeared.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand the gentleman to say that we could not concern ourselves about the local government of the different States?

That would be my answer.

Mr. BORLAND. Would there not be a great diversity of their rights or powers over their people and the method of choosing their representatives, and so on, if we did not have some uniform standard of government?

Mr. LEWIS. A uniform standard is proposed for the selection of the legislators and the President. The latter would be selected through electors chosen by the legislators of the member States, as our first Presidents were selected. The legislators would be selected, the Senators by the authority in each nation that now selects ambassadors, and the representatives by the lower house; for illustration, the House of Commons, the Chamber of Deputies, the lower houses would select them.

think there would not be great popular interest in the proceedings of the institution after it had become fully established. With public order and the inviolability of national boundaries conclusively established, its legislative subject matters would be so few and so remote from the affairs of common life that it would be mostly publicists, travelers, shippers, and so forth, that would commonly concern themselves with its work.

Mr. EMERSON. How would the gentleman get around the fact that nations of different races and religions might combine against other nations of different religions and races?

Mr. LEWIS. The nations being represented in that Congress as our States are represented in this, the relative possibilities can be compared. There does not seem more danger in that direction than there is of some of our States with a special interest controlling this whole body.

If, EMERSON. We see it done here every session.

Mr. LEWIS. These little difficulties to which you refer are negligible compared with the calamities of war.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman stated a while ago that all national governments had been established by the sword.

Mr. LEWIS. For the most part.
Mr. DECKER. And even in our own country is it not a fact that there came a time when the sword had to maintain it? Well, now, does the gentleman think in that connection perhaps an international government might also have to come to the same sword? Has the gentleman thought of that? What suggestion has the gentleman as to that?

Mr. LEWIS. I have thought of that; and while the wisest human being can not peer very far through the abstruse complications of human circumstance into coming time, it has occurred to me that something might arise to endanger such a federation, just as slavery, the vulnus immedicabile of our federation, challenged it. Now, with domestic questions like that, and the hundreds of others involved in our social relations, the federation would have, and should exercise, no power of interference whatever. But I can imagine one national condition of a character possibly making it international in its effect. In the generations to come an overcrowded India or China might demand access for its population to the less populated sections of the earth, demands which, being refused by the States concerned on racial or economic grounds, might lead to attempted secession from the union and to war. But the danger, if such it be, would be a danger as actual for the States unfederated, and the problem perhaps less soluble than with an organized inter-

Now, gentlemen of the House, what I have been saying is, of course, but kindergarten to men of your experience. It is a mere truism to say that public order and personal security mean but one thing at last, and that is government-monarchical government, republican government, aristocratic government, or democratic government, what you will, but still government. Humanity in all times and in all circumstances has adopted only this institution to secure peace and order in their domestic communities. I believe the time will come, I believe the time has come, when as Members of this great Parliament we should do all in our power to advance the day of public order for the community of nations. Experience has provided the form and the

"Oh, it can not be done; it is only a dream," says the pessimist, who is "afraid to brush down the cobwebs lest the ceiling may fall." But the trouble with your pessimist is, he dreams just as much as any other dreamer, but he always dreams nightmares. It can be done, say the fathers, who did it for us and who speak to all mankind through the institutions of which we are the human elements to-day. They supplied the form. We must supply the faith. It is the one thing necessary now, I submit. Faith, faith, the faith to act. And that, too, the fathers supplied us by their example in this very matter. All departures, any constructive changes, however well sustained by reason and experience, require faith. No effort can be truly great without it. Said the philosopher Turgot, "I never admired Columbus so much for discovering a new world as I did for going out to hunt for it on the faith of an opinion.

Washington had this faith. It is but the faith of the rational man that civilization can go on making progress in the future as it has done in the past. Columbus had it indeed. If it were not for his kind of faith we might not be here to-day. We can see in his example the ethical elements necessary in men's hearts for our situation. In the words of Webster, "I see him standing on the deck of his shattered bark, the shades of night falling on the sea, yet no man sleeping, tossed on the billows of an unknown ocean; yet the stronger billows of alternate hope and despair tossing his own troubled thoughts, extending forward his harassed form, straining westward his anxious and eager eyes, till Heaven at last granted him a moment of rapture and ecstacy by blessing his vision with a sight of the unknown world." there a leadership in the world now equal to this great occasion? If there is, spirit of Washington bid him step forth. [Loud applause.]

APPENDIX.

PROGRAM LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE.

"We believe it to be desirable for the United States to join a league of nations binding the signatories to the following:

"First. All justiciable questions arising between the signatory powers, not settled by negotiation, shall, subject to the limitations of treaties, be submitted to a judicial tribunal for hearing and judgment, both upon the merits and upon any issue as to its jurisdiction of the question.

Second. All other questions arising between the signatories, and not settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to a council of conciliation for hearing consideration and recommendation.

"Third. The signatory powers shall jointly use forthwith both their economic and military against any one of their number that goes to war or commits acts of hostility against another of the signatories before any question arising shall be submitted as provided in the foregoing.

"Fourth. Conferences between the signatory powers shall be held from time to time to formulate and codify rules of international law, which, unless some signatory shall signify its dissent within a stated period, shall thereafter govern in the decisions of the judicial tribunal mentioned in article 1.'

THE TREATY-MAKING POWER.

The Peace Advocate suggests that several provisions of our Constitution would have to be changed to enable the Senate to ratify a treaty creating an international government with the exclusive power of making treaties, or the powers "to declare war," "raise and support armies," and so forth, now committed to the Senate and Congress. This suggestion overlooks the fundamental distinction between the "law" making and the "treaty" making powers under the Constitution. A law must be in "pursuance" of the Constitution; a treaty is not required to be. The Constitution provides:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Laws operate only on land over which our Government is an exclusive sovereign, and can thus always so formulate them as to conform to the Constitution. But treaties operate upon other nations, and therefore must conform to the wills of all the signatory powers. For example: Our Constitution guarantees every State a republican form of government. But if a monarchical power were to occupy, say, the State of Maine, and vanquish us in the war, the treaty of peace might have to commit such State to a monarchical form of government through conquest. And no court could nullify such treaty on the ground that it violated the Constitution. This was all within the ken of those who made the Constitution. Therefore while only laws made in "pursuance" of the Constitution are valid, yet "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States," are valid when properly ratified. Otherwise our first unsuccessful war, involving terms of peace disappointing to some alleged constitutional inhibitions, might find us institutionally impotent to make terms of peace with a superior force. In which event the Government itself would perish, and the whole Constitution with it, in the nature of things, and ex necessitate in case of war, the treaty-making right, or power, can not be subject to any such limitations. It is the right of self-preservation, and must be free footed and free armed.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the Army.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. Saunders in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Army War College: For expenses of the Army War College, being for the purchase of the necessary stationery; typewriters and exchange of same; office, toilet, and desk furniture; textbooks; books of reference; scientific and professional papers and periodicals; printing and binding; maps; police utensils; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, including $25 per month additional to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College building, $9,000.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, Yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] addressed the House, and among other things he made the following statement, and it appears in the Record on page 3855. After referring to the present war in Europe, he said:

ring to the present war in Europe, he said:

Now, we may be drawn into the struggle. If we are, whatever opinion we may have had in reference to the propriety of being drawn into the struggle will be merged in a universal opinion to stand for the country in what it determines to do. [Applause.] I want to call attention to this: Suppose we become engaged in the European war, and finally there are overtures for peace from one side or the other. If we are a party to the war, we have got to sit in at the final councils. We will have to help to determine the terms of peace, and at once, at one sweep, we will have abandoned the traditional and long-continued policy of the United States to remain supreme on the American Continent and to keep out of the complications of the European Continent, [Applause.] And when we engage in endeavoring to determine the boundary lines of the various nations of Europe, the terms upon which peace shall be made, the guaranties which will be exacted in reference to the small powers of Europe, we will have placed ourselves in a postition where it becomes our duty to endeavor to regulate what Bulgaria or Greece or Servia or Holland or Belgium or Russia or the great or small powers, wherever they may be, shall do. And when we undertake to enter a policy which requires us to interfere in European affairs we can no longer ask or insist upon the traditional policy of the United States that European countries shall keep their hands out of American affairs. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois bases his statement as to what may occur upon the condition that we get into the European war, and, I suppose, nobody wants to dispute the consequences that might follow the result of our getting into the European war; but the very language used implies that getting into that controversy between the contending parties we will have to be a party to a final peace conference between those Governments, because in no other way can we be called into the final settlement of the issues between them, even down to the adjustment of the boundary lines of a few little Balkan Governments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman had any idea, or intended to leave the impression, that we could not have an armed conflict with some one of the warring powers, no matter whether it is with an entente ally or with a central power, upon an issue arising simply and solely between that power and ourselves, but that by the very reason of the fact of having done so we would become a necessary party in the final councils as to peace between all the contending powers now in war with one another. In other words, that if we should have a controversy with England, France, Russia, or Germany about an issue exclusively between one of these powers and ourselves that we could not make a separate peace when we adjust that particular difficulty. Such an impression as this going forth to the country causes questions to be asked like those coming to us now by the hundreds in the form of postal I suppose you have all received them. I will just read the first clause of one of these postal cards, which is in parentheses, as follows:

Note.-In modifying her war zone note, Germany has offered-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I was so much interrupted I would be glad to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. Does not the gentleman feel that a discussion of this proposition on the floor of this House is more apt to aggravate the situation than anything else?

I am trying to remove an erroneous representa-Mr. SIMS.

Mr. EMERSON. Every other gentleman tries to remove

Mr. SIMS. You are taking up my time. I think it is proper to discuss it

Mr. EMERSON. I stated yesterday that I should object to any Member discussing this proposition on the floor of this House until the President came to us and asked us to do so. Now, I am not-

I did not hear the statement.

Mr. EMERSON. I am not going to object to the gentleman having five minutes more, but I do want to say, Mr. Chairman, to the Members of this House that those Members that are inflicted with this diarrhea of words on this subject will have to relieve themselves somewhere else than on the floor of this

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I hope I may have a little order, inasmuch as an ultimatum has been issued.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object, to observe that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.]

EMERSON] is about to go home, and that his objection will not last after he is married to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania reserved his objection too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserved his right to object just at the moment the gentleman from Ohio sat down.

Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Mr. SIMS. This postal card starts out by saying:

In modifying her war-zone note Germany has offered safe passage for all American passenger ships which keep to a prescribed course and which our Government guarantees free from contraband.

The first question is:

Do you think we should enter this war in order to uphold our legal right to go into the war zone regardless of these conditions?

That is an absolutely unfair question. It is one that is mis-leading. "To go into this war" is using the same language as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] used. That is wholly an assumption. Suppose that we resent and resist the violations of international law whereby the lives and property of American citizens are ruthlessly destroyed by Germany and at the same time England comes along and does identically the same thing in some other way and we resent that also, and we get into an armed conflict with both in undertaking to defend our rights as against both? Then what sort of a fix will we be in in sitting down to the final council as pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois? We will be on both sides I do not believe that statement was worthy of the great ability and knowledge of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman-

Mr. SIMS. Do not interrupt me now.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] referred to an interesting portion of our history—I was here at the time when we got into the Spanish-American War, a war of aggression on our part, in which we invaded the soil of a foreign country on account of the treatment by that foreign country of its own citizens under its own flag on its own soil.

In that great war-not great except in the purpose for which it was waged-no referendum, by postal card or otherwise, was submitted to this Congress or demanded of it, and two distinguished gentlemen-I remember it well, because they have both been named in the House debate recently—one the gen-tleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, and the other the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, without compulsion, without this country having been invaded or even threatened with invasion, voluntarily joined the forces of the United States to invade a foreign country, to wage war upon Spain, because Spain did not regulate the conduct of her subjects according to the standards and ideals of the American people; and no referendum was asked, and no reproach has been put upon any man who went into that war for the purposes for which we waged it.

I think we did right as a matter of principle. stand for what is right, regardless of the size of the nation that invades our country or disregards our rights, whether on land or on sea. An invasion is usually referred to when a land attack is made, but you can invade our rights at sea as well as on land. These postal cards are so written and the question is so asked as not to get real information, but to get a misleading reply, and I think instead of helping us to keep faith with and uphold our President it is stirring up strife. Suppose the question was this: "Would you use the armed forces of the United States to save the lives and property of American citizens and their rights, guaranteed under the Constitution, against the unlawful encroachments of foreign powers?" They would say "Yes" every time.

We do not want war. The President does not want war. We are not seeking war. We may be forced into it. But we will not have to settle the boundary of Montenegro or any of the small nations of Europe, because we are defending our own rights on sea as well as on land. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire, first, what the gentleman from Tennessee proposes to do?

Mr. KEATING. He proposed to strike out the last word in the paragraph just read by the Clerk, and I am always opposed to that amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, what is the matter with the American Army? That is a question that is frequently asked in this House and throughout the country in connection with our plans for national defense.

For some reason the American boy will not enlist in any great numbers in the American Army; and if he does enlist, he gets out of the Army as soon as possible.

Now, what is the trouble?

A great many gentlemen have appeared before committees of this House to answer that question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KEATING. I regret I can not yield. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KEATING. A great many gentlemen have attempted to answer that question. I want to submit to the House this morning the views of a man whose opinions, in my judgment, are entitled to respect. He is not a "mollycoddle." I do not think he is a "milksop." He is a man who has served perhaps 20 years in the Military Establishment of this country. For his years, I presume, he has seen as much actual service and has been under fire as often as any other man connected with the Military Establishment. The gentleman to whom I refer is Maj. William C. Harllee, of the Marine Corps.

In presenting his testimony before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, Maj. Harllee described his military service as I belong to the Marine Corps, the soldier corps of the Navy. I have served in the Volunteer Army as private, corporal, sergeant, and first sergeant during the Philippine insurrection, and as a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point for two years, and for 17 years as an officer of the Marine Corps, appointed from civil life.

Instead of attempting to militarize America and to bring America to the ideals of the present military orthodoxy, why not Americanize our military institution and bring it to the ideals of America?

When you have brought the military system in harmony with things American, you will find a different attitude toward it and no necessity for such drastic measures as compulsory or universal service.

The American people are not pusilianimous; they have not lost their military virtue; they need no system bolstered up by courts, jails, and military constabularies to bring them to a proper preparation for national defense.

Our present military institution violates some of our best American traditions. Purge it of the distasteful things, make it businesslike, adopt in it accepted American methods, and you will find thousands of willing men—more than you can take care of for military training. They are not willing, however, to enter it as it now stands. I interpret it as a protest against our methods and not as any indication that American manhood is on the decline.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the major describe what the American military methods are that he proposed to establish?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, yes, indeed. He describes them in detail, and at the request of the members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs he has even prepared a bill; and with the consent of the House I will insert it in the RECORD, so that Members may read it. It is a soldier's bill, not prepared with the skill of a lawyer, but it states in plain language what a soldier believes is necessary in order to Americanize the American Army

Mr. MADDEN. If a soldier has the ability to manage the forces of the American Army, he will probably be the general of the Army and not a private.

Mr. KEATING. Why, not at all. The gentleman from Illinois will understand that in order to secure promotion in the American Army at the present time the man above you must either resign or die, and military men do not resign, and they do not die in any great numbers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.
Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that there are 1,700 vacancies in the American Army to-day.

Mr. HOWARD. Those are caused by the Hay bill. Those vacancies have never been filled.

Mr. KEATING. Of course, I am not going to enter into act. The gentleman knows as well as I do and a great deal better the methods of promotion in the American Army. He knows, as a matter of fact, that it is in the main a case of the other fellow dying or resigning.

Mr. TILSON. Or retiring.
Mr. KEATING. Or retiring.
Mr. TOWNER. Is it not likely that a man who has served, as this man has served, in the ranks, knows something at least of the men who are to go into the ranks?

Mr. KEATING. That is exactly the value of this testimony Here is a man of education, with experience as a private and as an officer.

Mr. GARDNER. Maj. Harllee served as a private as a volunteer and not in the Regular Army.

Mr. KEATING. That may be true. He served in the volunteer army as a private, and in various other positions. He has served as been at the Military Academy at West Point. He has served as an officer in the Marine Corps for 17 years. He knows something about the American Military Establishment. He goes on:

Our military institution is not an American development. It remains substantially unchanged since it was imported at the beginning of our Government from England and continental Europe, from countries where there were two classes of men—gentlemen and common men. The officers came from the gentleman class, the enlisted men represented the common caste. The situation fitted such a social structure, but it does not fit America. There is only one class of men here, except in the Military Establishment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.
Mr. CALDWELL. Has the gentleman examined into the walks of life from which our present American Army officers

Mr. KEATING. It is not a question of the walk of life from which an officer comes, but it is the state of mind in which he emerges from the Military Academy. I know that boys are appointed to the Military Academy who are the sons of hod carriers and the sons of blacksmiths, but when they come out of the Military Academy they feel that their whole social status has been changed.

of the Military status has been changed.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has stated that Maj. Harllee was in the Military Academy. Can the gentleman state why he left there?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know, aside from his testimony; but I take it for granted that a man who is now a major in the Marine Corps of the United States severed his connection with the Military Academy in an honorable manner.

Mr. KAHN. I dare say. He may have been dropped, and he would get an honorable discharge for that.

Mr. KEATING. He may have failed in an examination. He may have resigned. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KEATING. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman, on account of the interruptions?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks an additional five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have 10 minutes in which to answer. I should like to couple this with the gentleman's request.

Mr. KEATING. I scarcely think, Mr. Chairman, that that is a fair proposition. I do not object to it, but I will suggest this: I have sat in this House and have treated the gentleman from Massachusetts with the courtesy to which I felt he was entitled. I have never objected to one of his requests, and have never coupled one of my requests with a request made by him. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his request.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto conclude at the expiration of 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.
Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEATING. I can not yield, because I am really more anxious to present Maj. Harllee's views to this House than I am to present my own.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to be interrupted,
Mr. KEATING. Maj. Harllee proceeds:

The law recognizes two separate and distinct classes of men in our military service. They are absolutely separate and distinct. There is a line of cleavage between them. Pride and self-respect are the best elements of military character. Caste crushes them both. Napoleon destroyed caste because it injured the business. The impulse which the French Revolution gave to the French Army has never reached the American Regular Establishment.

There was no caste in the Confederate Army nor the citizen army of the United States in the sixties. Why breed it in barracks armies to serve as a model for citizen soldiery?

OATH OF ENLISTMENT OBNOXIOUS.

The thing above all others which prevents men from entering the military service is the oath of enlistment. It is an oath of bondage, Any other employer who contracted with men on this basis would be guilty of peonage—a felony under the law of the Nation which practices it itself. In my own experience in recruiting I found men unwilling to subscribe to such an oath. It is not fair to men who are unfamiliar with the military service to ask them to enter into any such agreement and it is not necessary. There is an instinct in young men which inspires an ambition to be a soldier, and plenty of men are willing and anxious to be of service if it can only be done in an honorable and respectable way—witness the men who went to Plattsburg—but they are not willing to be branded as men of a lower caste or in time of peace to subscribe to an oath of bondage.

DISSATISFIED MEN OF NO VALUE.

Unhappy or dissatisfied men are of no service to a military or any other body, and it is better policy to let them go, and then if everybody should go to inquire into the cause and seek the remedy. I am opposed to universal service or compulsory service or any other kind of service than that rendered by willing men. I am opposed to it, because dumb driven cattle can not be taught or trained. I am too proud to be comrade with Moldy, Shadow. Wart, Feeble, and Bull Cali in a Falstaffian host. Like King Henry rather "proclaim it to the host that he who hath no stomach for the fight, let him depart, for we would not serve in that man's company who fears his fellowship to serve with us." The Persians had universal service. The Greeks did not. It is not the size of your host, but it is the quality of it that adds luster to the arms. Unwilling men burden armies, eat its substance, retard its action, and give it panic. Even if there were enough jails and Federal constabularies to enforce universal service without riots among a people, it would not be good business to do it. The profession of arms ought to be honorable; spare it from contamination by Moldy and Bull Calis.

There is nothing subtle about military training. It does not require years to train a soldier. The individual instruction is simple. It can be done in weeks, and with the proper machinery developed in less time than any army can cross any ocean. It was done in the volunteer eigenents which went to the Philippines in 1899. Nobody there ever discounted the work of our Volunteers. It is done in the Marine Corps all the time. It was done at Plattsburg in a month. To cook, to bivouac, to march, to move from column of march into line of fight, to dig, to shoot, to give first-aid treatment, these are the salient points of a real soldier's instruction. Yet they are not the features practiced in the life of the barracks. Compare your mental picture of life and conditions at barracks with your mental picture of life in the trenches, or anywhere in Europe to-day,

BARRACKS LIFE INJURES MEN.

The barracks life in idleness impairs the usefulness of a man for the soldier or any other business. It atrophies the talents of its officers. It accustoms all to things not pertinent to the real soldier business and trains men in the wrong habits. It untrains men or overtrains them. Few officers can withstand many years of this so-called training and preserve their usefulness. Grant, Sherman, and Jackson had but few years of this training. Lee, J. E. Johnson, and Longstreet were staff officers and had little of the barracks training. Sheridan, Hood, and Stuart were young men who had received but little of it. Forrest, Hampton, and Gordon were citizens and had none of it.

It is a significant thing how many of the effective officers of both armies of our Civil War fall into these four classes: First, officers who had had a few years' service in the Regular Army—and part of that in the War with Mexico—and then went out into civil life; second, those who, while they remained on the pay roll, were staff officers and avoided the influences of this so-called training; third, young men who had been in but a few years when the war began; and, fourth, men who had always been civilians when the war began; and, fourth, men who had seen in but a few years when the war began, and it is significant how few of those who had spent their lives in the garrisons arose to the occasion in real war.

A NEW ACTIVE ARMY EACH YEAR.

A NEW ACTIVE ARMY EACH YEAR.

A NEW ACTIVE ARMY EACH YEAR.

My plan for removing the objectionable features and for furnishing a system which wild develop habits of organizing real armies and a system of real training is this:

A new army each year. An active army—give it a good name, so it will be proud of its name. Its period of training to be not over six months, perhaps shorter, to accommodate it to the vacation period of colleges. Have no oath of enlistment. Pay its lowest grade respectable pay, but withhold all except a nominal monthly sum until the end of the period. If anyone wants to quit, let him quit, but without compensation. On the other hand, if anyone was not desirable, simply discharge him on the same basis and not resort to jalis, etc., to try to reform or make him obedient. One month at barrack's rendezvous for individual instruction, the remainder of the time afield. At the end of the period after marching back to the rendezvous discharge everybody and tie no strings to them.

strings to them.

Equip it with nothing but working clothes, a gun, some ammunition, a bag for carrying rations, suitable cooking utensils, a water bottle, and a blanket.

HOW TO SELECT COMMANDERS.

At the time of discharge reappoint the leaders for the next year. Rearrange the present grades so that the commander of 10 men would be officer in as strict a sense as any other commander and as proud of his job. Appoint him in the same way and give him a respectable salary. The other commanders appointed at the same time, each grade selected by the next higher commander under whom they are to serve, and to be selected from the next lower grade, so that an officer must advance a grade each year or go out. This would send into civil life each year officers experienced in all grades, who would have been through the process necessary when we have to form volunteers into armies. It would furnish rapid advancement to young men of demonstrated capacity. Those who select their own subordinates could be relied upon to select the proper men, because their own chances for future selection would depend upon the work of these men. The only route to the command of this army should be through its ranks. This would dignify service in the ranks.

mand of this army should be through its talks.

After the discharge of the army and the selection of the next year's leaders these leaders could be organized in a school and taught special subjects and advanced military work and be given a normal course in teaching for their next year's work, and finally a suitable time before the next year's army was to be assembled could be the force which would recruit this army, and if they fall to recruit their armies under this plan, drop them from the pay roll.

MANEUVERING IN THE FIELD.

After one month's individual instruction the different parts of the Army to move out without any tents and with but few wagons, and spend the remainder of the time afield in bivouac and on the march, assembling with other bodies forming larger bodies and moving toward the Government reservations of land, where field exercises with actual armies, instead of imaginary armies, would operate against each other.

An army thus afield would accumulate field habits instead of barrack habits, would furnish the staff an opportunity to cater to actual armies and discover their habits and needs. Federal hospitals could be established all over the country connected with such a system and also serve as public hospitals.

This army would have no dress uniform, no dances, no garrison life to foster caste. Most of its officers would be without families or dependents, and there would be no problem of taking care of their families. It would breed no permanent military class to live on the Government forever, for even its generals would have passed through its processes and into civil life before they became too old to begin civilian careers. Some could go into the permanent staff. There would be no retired list. Such an army would commend itself to businessilke Americans. It would not be suspected of loafing. It would have no caste, no bondage. It would be thoroughly American. It would furnish a reliable supply of tested leaders and would accustom us to the practice of efficiently using the material which must inevitably be the material for America's wars.

ARMIES DO NOT NEED TENTS.

ARMIES DO NOT NEED TENTS.

Training nowadays seems to run to getting into camp with tents. Lee's army had no tents, neither did Napoleon's, and I venture to say that you will find but few tents in Europe to-day—armies which can not live afield without tents are not armies; they are camping parties. Casar tells us that the Gauls did not sleep under roofs for seven years. An army which intends to move can not encumber itself with tents, and living in tents is not real training for real service.

So little preparation for real service have we had that our field-service regulations anticipate connecting with the wagons for rations every day. Men can carry on their persons a week's supply of a simple ration, and an army whose habits tie it to a wagon train is not the active army I have been picturing to you.

One of the false ideas which develop among peace-time and barrack soldiery is the fettich for regulation equipment. The soldier needs but little equipment, and as soon as he gets afield he quickly divests himself of everything superfluous. He needs a gun, some ammunition, a blanket, something to tote and cook his rations in, and a water bettie. It doesn't make any difference what is the pattern of his bag or his frying pan or even his blanket. The only thing that must be of a standard pattern is that his ammunition must fit his gun. When we get down to real business we will be glad to have him bring his blanket, his bag, and his frying pan from home with him, and we won't quibble over the cut of his uniform. This idea is not strange, if you will picture to yourself the armies of the sixties or the men in Europe to-day.

REAL VERSUS FALSE DISCIPLINE.

The true discipline is not the kind which reduces the man to the level of a horse teaches him to obey and do which reduces the man to the level of a horse teaches him to obey and do what he is told and nothing elections.

ture to yourself the armies of the sixties or the men in Europe to-day.

REAL VERSUS FALSE DISCIPLINE.

The true discipline is not the kind which reduces the man to the level of a horse, teaches him to obey and do what he is told and nothing else and makes within him a fear of his officers and of the law. Such a discipline would not serve you in time of danger.

Real discipline is the discipline which comes from comradeship and community of interest. Active armies are always disciplined. Idle bodies are never so. The joy of labor is the panacea for discipline. Men should be trained to give expression to their thought and to depart from instructions in order to accomplish the purpose. An intelligent cooperation is superior to dumb and unreasoning obedience, and men who are trained to abandon reason are not the kind who possess true discipline.

Do not put your faith in any system of organizing reserves. When a man separates from the military service let him go without any strings upon him. No man can tell what his condition of life will be in the future, whether he can abandon his civilian pursuits or not. Industrial life in America is restless; men move from place to place. It is a different operation to collect men after they have gone different ways and identified themselves in different pursuits.

It is easier to start fresh and accept those who offer themselves and want to be accepted. Such a plan automatically accommodates itself to industrial conditions. Only those men who can disengage from industry will then serve. If you attempt to forcibly disengage men from their places in industrial life, you will have friction.

America needs not a nation in arms, for we have seen what a nation in arms has brought to humanity, but needs a system and working habits by which willing men, the only kind who are not a burden to an establishment, can be made by American methods into an efficient army—a system which will furnish leaders and teachers who know how to lead and teach and who have practiced the art of organizi

MUST GET RID OF " DEADWOOD."

Whatever machinery you build up, whatever monopolies are created for the ground-floor people, we will find that in true need new men will spring up into leadership; brave and willing men will gather around them, as they did in 1861 and 1898, and unless your machinery is simple and direct it will fail and new and vigorous bodies will spring from the wreckage of your machinery and you will eventually accept them and call for more, but you will lose time and let enthusiasm dissipate while the so-called trained experts on the ground floor are telling you that they are no good.

If war should come now the most serious problem would not be that people would be lacking to bear arms, or would not bear them with credit to themselves, but it would be in working off the old deadwood which has risen to the top of the military service by the passage of time, men who are entrenched there by law, but who are unaccustomed to the habits of active armies. The development of new leaders and the casting off of the old were the real problems of the war of the sixtles. Why not develop leaders now by each year organizing armies for an active life outdoors?

The profession of arms is my profession. What I have said to you is not said in hostility, but in a desire to point out a plan which will bring the profession into closer friendship with the people of our country.

The following recommendations will be submitted by those designated for appointment or appointed in and for a division of each annual active army. Each brigadier general will submit to his major general commanding the names of those recommended for appointment as colonels and lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains in his regiment. Each major will submit to his brigadier general the names of those recommended for appointment as captains and lieutenants in his battalion, and each captain will submit to his major the names of those recommended for appointment in all grades of officers in his company. Sec. 15. That men and officers of the active army come within the pensionable status only when they become subject to military laws and the Articles of War in the time of war or when war or invasion is imminent. At other times their status is the same as any other civil employee of the Government, provided that officers or men of the Army, including National Guard and other parts of the Military Establishment, or Marine Corps serving in or detached for service with the active army do not thereby forfeit the benefits of such status or the benefit of continuous service or any other benefit which would have accrued to them had they remained in their previous service. Officers or men of the Army and Marine Corps serving in the active army do not cease to be persons subject to military law and to the Articles of War. In time of war or when war or invasion is imminent the status of the active army is the same as the Regular Army in respect to the Articles of War, in respect to all benefits so far as the laws and regulations are applicable to officers or men whose permanent retention in the military service is not contemplated by existing laws, and in other respects not herein provided for. No distinction will then be made between the active army and the Regular Army in legal processes.

Sec. 16. That for active armies for training, the months of January, February, and March are designated, as the officers' school period. The month of April as the recruiting period. The months of May and June as the inishing period. The months of July, August, and September as the finishing period. The months of October, November, and December as the finishing period.

The officers of the active army for training will assemble at their own expense for transportation by regiments at such rendezvous as are designated by the respective ma period.

The major generals commanding will designate the recruiting rendezvous for each company or regiment. The captain of each company, with the assistance of the officers of his company, will recruit his own company and begin the instruction of each man as soon as he is en-company and begin the instruction of each man as soon as he is enrolled.

As soon as possible in the instruction period the companies of each regiment will be assembled at regimental rendezvous designated by the major generals commanding and equipped for service, and a curriculum of instruction, including practical and theoretical instruction in rifle practice, intrenching, field cooking, first-aid treatment, bivouacking, marching, and the necessary field evolutions will be begun, provided that companies may be designated as school, college, or university companies to recruit their privates principally from students in attendance at schools or other institutions of learning, and such companies may be equipped and receive their instruction during the period of instruction at the places where they are organized at hours which do not interfere with the hours of schools, and their assembling at the regimental rend-zvous may be delayed until the beginning of the field period. The men of such companies will receive no subsistence until the companies join the regiments, and their privates will be discharged in time to permit them to be present at the beginning of their next school term.

period. The men of such companies will receive no subsistence until the companies join the regiments, and their privates will be discharged in time to permit them to be present at the beginning of their next school term.

When the officers of a company fail to recruit the company to its minimum required strength by July 1 all the officers may be discharged and the company may be replaced by a company detached from the Army, National Guard. or Marine Corps, or a volunteer company may be accepted and its officers appointed without regard to previous service, or its place may be left vacant. Recruits may be received at any time before the completion of the field period, provided the strength of the company does not exceed the maximum authorized strength. Companies will be subdivided into squads commanded by corporals and sergeants, and the integrity of the squad organization will be preserved by making them when afield the messing units to which issues of rations are made, and by utilizing the squad organization whenever possible in the performance of work and duty.

Sec. 17. That at the beginning of the field period all regiments will be moved out from their rendezvous and assemble afield with the other regiments of their brigade and remain afield during the remainder of the field period or until ordered to their respective rendezvous for the discharge of the privates.

The movement of the armies thus afield will be planned to utilize Government or State reservations or other tracts available at a reasonable cost for field exercises and maneuvers. During the field period the principal method of moving troops will be by marching.

Armies afield will be equipped with the minimum of equipment necessary transportation. Troops will habitually bivouac or temporarily occupy available buildings, and their movements and stops will be regulated to take advantage of the use of existing storehouses, commercial transportation, and the agencies of commercial supply. Only one kind of uniform will be required of each soldier and accumulation and transportation of property unnecessary for field service will be prohibited.

The brigades of the division will be ultimately assembled for division maneuvers and evolutions, and for the purpose of holding grand maneuvers the President may organize the several divisions into two or more armies under the tactical command of officers who have organized and commanded divisions of the active armies.

Sec. 18. That in the later part of the field period the regiments will return to their respective rendezvous, where the privates will then be discharged by the regimental commanders. No transportation will be furnished to the place of enrollment.

During the finishing period the property will be secured and held ready for use of the next year's field army, and the accounts and records will be completed and submitted. Where an officer has acquitted himself of his accountability and responsibility, he may be granted, upon his application, by the regimental commander a furlough on full pay of not exceeding one month, and may be discharged to take effect at the end of his furlough, and receive his furlough pay in advance: Provided, That no pay will be paid for a period after December 31. During this period the officers present, not otherwise employed, will be instructed in the military arts and science.

The property of the active army may be delivered into the custody of officers of the Regular Army designated by the Secretary of War to receive it, and when so received it will be held in trust for delivery to the succeeding division of the active army without transfer of funds, and such parts of it as are from time to time needed will be transferred, upon request, to the authorized agents of the major general commanding.

Sec. 19. That all returns, muster rolls, and records of personnel of organizations of each division of the active army shall be rendered to its major general commanding, shall be transmitted by him, and filed in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army. Medical records will be kept and filed as required for medical records of the Regular Army.

in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army. Medical records will be kept and filed as required for medical records of the Regular Army.

All money accounts and property returns of officers in each division of the active army will be rendered to major general commanding, who shall have administrative control. He shall make such consolidated accounts and returns to the Secretary of War as the Secretary of War may require, and cause the disbursing officers under his command to make the required returns to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 20. That the sum of $40,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of raising, organizing, equipping, training, and maintaining the active army of the calendar year 1918, which sum may be expended in part in each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1918, and June 30, 1919: Provided, That this sum will be allotted by the Secretary of War among the several major generals commanding divisions of the active army, to be expended and disbursed in each division under the direction of its commanding general, and for any and all purposes set forth herein, and that the commanding generals are responsible only to the Secretary of War and not to any bureau of the War Department, and the control of the property purchased from the funds of this appropriation remain with the commanding generals of divisions of the active army, and when stored in depots or transferred to officers of the Regular Army for safekeeping it remains in trust for the use of the active army.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. Maj. Harllee is a gentleman with ideas which differ conspicuously from those of his associate officers and from the enlisted men.

As I told the House late the other afternoon, I went to the border in November largely with the idea of finding out why men do not enlist in the Regular Army. I went to the El Paso, Tex., district, and subsequently I went down to Colonia Dublan, in Mexico, in order to visit the Regular Army there and see the enlisted men. I began at El Paso by going to the Young Men's Christian Associations of the National Guard and getting in touch with individual National Guardsmen through the Young Men's Christian Association. Then I went to Chaplain Axton, at Fort Bliss. By him I was put in communication with six different enlisted men of the Regular Army who had been on recruiting duty themselves. Recruiting officers stay in an office and attend to the paper work of enlistment and the administra-tion of oaths. The enlisted men on recruiting duty go down on the street corner and argue with the would-be recruits.

After my investigation at Fort Bliss, Tex., I went down to Colonia Dublan, in Mexico, and there I met five more noncommissioned officers and privates who had been actually on recruiting duty. Altogether I met and interviewed 11 noncommissioned officers and privates, representing five different or-ganizations. In no case did they have an opportunity to con-sult with each other beforehand, because in no case did they know what I wanted to talk about. In one case the arrangements for the interviews were made by the chaplain and in the other case I think that they were made by the son of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Shallenberger]. When I went down to the border I was imbued with the idea that this Army caste business about which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keat-ING] has been talking, had a great deal to do with the shortage of enlistments. I talked with Regular officers with whom I had served, and I pointed out that there was this idea about officers' snobbishness abroad. My friends felt that I had been misled. I said, "I am afraid there is something in it." I went to the border with that idea, but after I had looked into the matter I changed my opinion 180 degrees. In other words, I exactly reversed my former views. The 11 men whom I interviewed were unanimous in declaring that there are two principal reasons for nonenlistment which stand out beyond everything else. One of these reasons is that we do not pay our men enough, and the other reason is because there is too long a con-tract of service.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will yield, Maj. Harllee has recommended that the pay should be increased, and I agree with

Mr. GARDNER. Every one of those enlisted men agreed that these were the principal reasons for the scarcity of recruits, and 10 out of the 11 men agreed to as a deterrent the low pay outweighed the long contract for service. The eleventh thought that as a deterrent the long contract of service outweighed the low pay.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Were the 11 men whom the gentleman interviewed members of the Regular Army or National Guard?

Mr. GARDNER. They were all noncommissioned officers or privates of the Regular Army who had been on recruiting duty. I think that 10 were noncommissioned officers and that 1 was a private.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.
Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think that he could have got a candid answer from these men if they felt that they had been degraded by the enlistment, because of the system that prevailed?

Mr. GARDNER. I am quite sure these men were talking to me as they believed, and not trying to conceal their opinion on the caste system. I said, "As a matter of fact, is not there a lot in this caste business? Is it not the fact that the officers have a social air about them and try to put it all over the enlisted men, and when they see you with a lady on the street and you salute, is it not true that they are toplofty and perhaps fail to return the salute?" The soldiers replied that that was all "guardhouse lawyer" talk. I was astounded at the unanimity with which those enlisted men said that there was nothing in this talk that "Garri, rechibile to the content of the salute of the said that there was nothing in this talk that "Garri, rechibile to the said that there was nothing in this talk that "Garri, rechibile to the said that there was nothing in this talk that "Garri, rechibile to the said that there was nothing the said that there was nothing to the said that there was nothing to the said that there was nothing to the said that there was nothing the said that the said that there was nothing the said that the ing in this talk that officers' snobbishness impedes enlistment.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.
Mr. BAILEY. On the subject of the low pay, I have heard that matter raised a number of times. Is it not a fact that the pay of the soldier, taking into consideration all the other elements that enter into it, is about as good as it is outside?

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, nothing like as good. It is $15 or $20 less per month than the pay of the average workman. Men are willing to make some sacrifice, but are not willing to do all the sacrificing in the community. A community is nothing but a great group of men. Supposing that a dozen men get together and decide that some one of the lot has got to do the fighting. Here is Jones; he is getting $95 a month as a bricklayer. Another man gets $28 and all found as a farm hand, and the next man is getting $1,000 a year as a clerk. And so they say, "Garden, you go ahead and do the fighting." I say, "What will I get as my share if I do the fighting?" "Oh," they reply, "You will get $15 a month, all found, and take the rest out in patriotism." That is what we are saying to our recruits. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes, Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I see by the record that Gen. McCain is quoted as saying that the enlistments are 2,000 a

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, more than that; they average 4,000 per month. I think that the General testified that we gain about 2,000 men a month, net. But we have only gained 16,500 above our losses in the nine months which have elapsed since we passed the joint resolution of March 17, 1916, authorizing the President to bring the Regular Army up to its full strength, which as we were told, meant an increase of 20,000 men. Instead of getting those 20,000 men promptly, it has taken us over nine months to raise the strength of our Army by 16,500.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman would have to increase the wages of farm hands 50 per cent, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, I know that wages differ in different communities. In Virginia, for instance, white farm laborers get about $18 a month and bacon and pork and fuel and housing for themselves and families. In some States the pay of farm laborers is higher and in others not so high. I have been over this question with a great many men in the National Guard. I specially tried to find out what the National Guard thought about the Regular Army. I got Gen. Bell to send out a list of questions to every first sergeant of the National Guard in his command, and there were 296 of them; and to every National Guard captain in his command, and there were 296 of them also; and to every National Guard colonel; and to every National Guard major who commanded a separate battalion, making 612 inquiries in all sent out at my request. Under the order issued each reply was to be returned not through military channels but directly to Gen. Bell, with the understanding that the name of the signer was to be held confidential. One of the questions asked was: "Have you any ideas as to universal military training; and if so, what are they?" Five hundred colonels, captains, and first sergeants replied that they were in favor of universal military training and only 10 opposed it.

Listen to the questions sent out by Gen. Bell and listen to the answers:

Here is Gen. Bell's order:

Headquarters, El Paso District,

El Paso, Tcx., December 13, 1916.

1. The following questions will be answered by each regimental commander, company commander, and first sergeant of the National Guard.

2. The answers will be written with a typewriter or pencil and the completed paper will then be sealed in an official envelope and mailed without delay direct to the "Commanding General, El Paso District, Mills Building, El Paso, Tex."

3. The district commander desires that each man called upon for report express his opinions without consultation with anyone.

By command of Brig. Gen. Bell:

H. H. Whitney.

H. H. WHITNEY, Lieutenant Colonel, Adjutant General, District Adjutant.

Here are the questions and answers:

No. 1. Question. Would the instruction of the National Guard proceed more rapidly if more Regular officers and noncommissioned officers were detailed for service with the National Guard?

Answer. Yes: Colonels, 18; captains, 190; first sergeants, 180; total yes, 388. No: Colonels, none; captains, 41; first sergeants, 53; total no, 94. Conditional: Colonels, 2; captains, 50; first sergeants, 38; total conditional, 90.

Note.—The noes were qualified in about half of the replies by the statement that there were "already enough," meaning. that one Regular officer and three Regular noncommissioned officers as at present detailed for the instruction of each regiment were ample.

No. 2. Question. Are the officers and enlisted men of the National Guard desirous of the instruction from the officers and noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army? If not, what is the reason?

Answer. Yes: Colonels, 16; captains, 217; first sergeants, 205; total yes, 438. No: Colonels, none; captains, 12; first sergeants, 30; total no, 42. Conditional: Colonels, 4; captains, 49; first sergeants, 17; conditional, 70.

No. 3. Question. Can you suggest any way in which the officers and men of the Regular Army cooperate more fully with the National Guard in the development of a citizen army?

Answer. The answers to this question may be roughly classified as follows: More cooperation by friendly intercourse and a closer relationship, 122; more careful selection of Regular Army instructors, 28; more instruction from Regular Army, particularly at home stations, 83; sundry suggestions, 50.

Note.—Over 70 replies to question No. 3 desired one regular officer with each regiment or separate battalion and one noncommissioned officer with each company instead of only three for the whole regiment, as at present.

No. 4. Question. Have you formed any opinion on the question of universal military training? If so, what are your ideas? Answer. In favor: Colonels, 16; captains, 250; first sergeants, 234. Total yes, 500. Against: Colonel, 1; captains, 5; first sergeants, 4. Total no, 10.

No. 5. Any additional remarks you may have to make bearing on the above.

Many of these remarks are most valuable. They will be made a subject of special study at Gen. Bell's headquarters,

Many a time in a speech on preparedness I have advocated universal compulsory military training. Every time I have been rewarded with thunders of applause. Moreover, recently when I tried it in the Middle West, in Cincinnati and in Detroit, I had as much applause for compulsory military training as I could have hoped for in my home town. There are several improvements which I wish I could see made in the lot of the enlisted man. I wish we would pass a law preventing such duty for enlisted men as the grading of the parks around some of the Army posts. I do not believe that that sort of duty is what they enlist for. The larger number of recruits come from the class of men whose necessities require them to take $15 a month because no better job is in sight. A lad comes to St. Louis, let us say. He thinks that he is going to find a good job on every street corner. Pretty soon he finds that he can not get a good job, and so he is obliged to take a poor job at $15 per month, unless the I. W. W.'s persuade him to stay away from the recruiting officer. If the recruiting officer persuades the recruit, Uncle Sam takes advantage of the latter's necessities and gets him to work for $15 a month.

The largest fraction of our recruits are men whose financial The second largest element is comnecessities are pressing. posed of men of an adventurous spirit, men who want to see the world's wheels go around, men who want a novelty. Probably the adventurer makes the very finest soldier of them all. A third class is composed of men who are tired of the particular job which they are doing at the time of their enlistment. For instance, a man may be a stonemason. He gets tired of being a stonemason, and he enlists in the Army, not because he is out of a job but because he is tired of being a stonemason. Then there is a fourth class—"snowbirds," as they call them. They come along in December and January, when the cold weather sets in, and they enlist with a deliberate purpose of deserting when the warm weather comes around. Their number is not large. I have gone carefully into those figures of Gen. McCain. It is true that we are gaining soldiers more quickly than we are losing them; but two things must be remembered: In the first place, winter enlistments are always larger. Furthermore, look at the actual figures: From February 29, 1916, to December 31, 1916, 10 months in all, the entire Army, notwithstanding all the reservists called back or held to the colors, was increased by only 16,521 recruits.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:
Contingencies, Military Information Section, General Staff Corps:
For contingent expenses of the military information section, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference; periodicals and newspapers; drafting and messenger service; and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; and of the branch office of the military information section at Manila; the cost of special instruction at home and abroad and in maintenance of students and attachés; and for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation, $11.000.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been very much interested in what both the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Keating] has had to say of Maj. Harllee's statement and the statement of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. Having at one time had a little experience in the Volunteer service, I think I can put my finger on some of the difficulties we are having in the recruiting of men in the Regular Establishment. In the first place. I want to say this-that I think, as these appropriations increase, and they have enormously increased, the people of this country are going to demand a more efficient administra-tion of our affairs, both as to the Navy and the Army. [Applause.

The business men of this country are paying for this preparedness propaganda, as our revenue legislation will disclose. There is no doubt about that, and I do not mean to say that it is wrong that they should pay for it. Here is one of the great troubles about the Regular Army: In the city of Atlanta, in my district, we have what is known as Fort McPherson. battalion post at this time. We have a battalion of soldiers out there, a minimum-strength battalion. They go out there and they get up in the morning to the same bugle call and go through the same drill the same length of time, see the colonel or the major sitting on the same horse, eat the same food, and then go down and start to play cards, or do anything on the face of the earth to kill the monotony of camp life. It is a fact that a man when he gets into the Regular Army feels that he is there absolutely stagnating for the time that he is in, and that when he gets out he will not be any better prepared for anything else in life than he was when he came in, and, in addition, he has acquired the habit of being trifling and lazy. whole truth about it. Another thing: There is not enough personal interest manifested by the officers in our Regular Army. I agree with my friend Keating from Colorado. I believe the Army officers and the Navy officers-and I believe it because of overt acts, from their manner, from their method of dealing with the practical questions of life—think that when God Almighty made each one of them he took a day off to do it, and did not do anything else on that day but finish him up. been reliably informed that they have got a rule over here at this Naval Academy that if a student's old mother comes to see him on his graduation day, or comes over there at some com-mencement, and that cadet goes down to the depot to meet his mother, and she has got a hand satchel that weighs 40 or 50 pounds, that that young fellow can not reach down and take his old mother's hand satchel, because it is below the dignity of an officer in the great American Navy to be polite to his old mother and carry a package of any kind. Well, God save the mark if that is the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong about that proposition.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, well, I do not know whether I am or not, and I do not think the gentleman knows; I hope I am wrong, but I have seen it stated in the papers and it happens that I have a friend of my family who visited over there last year at commencement and she tells me it is one of the rules. I do not know whether it is or not, but she heard it just like everybody else heard it; but I know they come out of there "feeling their oats" just a little bit more than before they I do not know what is the cause of it but there is something wrong when education makes a fool out of a fellow about some things. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? (After a pause.) The Chair hears

Mr. HOWARD. Now, I happen to have had the honor of serving on the Committee on Military Affairs of this House for two years and I tried to inform myself about some of the things while I was there. My honest judgment is that with every lump-sum appropriation that is made for the Army or the Navy 331 per cent of it is lost in the motion of getting that money to the real benefit of both services. Now let us see. We have in the American Army one of the craziest ideas I have ever seen stood for by people who have got any plain ordinary common sense. For instance, an officer will be stationed in New York. He is a first or second lieutenant, and they will issue an order, just like they were moving chess on a board, and they will ship him from New York to San Francisco, and they will take a man in San Francisco and ship him to New York to fill that officer's place. Then they will pick up a fellow in Maine and send him to Texas, his household furniture and everything costing him more, and we lose in absolutely useless transfers of officers anywhere from a million to a million and a half dollars a year. The men do not have time to form any personal attachment for their officers. They are transferring them all the time at the expense of the people for no particular reason.

Why is my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILson] so popular with his regiment? It is because he stays with them; they know him; they know what sort of a man he is and love him because he is human and considerate, and they are willing to do anything on the face of the earth he wants them to do. Why not adopt that same sensible system in our Regular Army? Now, another thing. Until we offer the American boy Why not adopt that same sensible system in our Regular something besides money to serve in the Regular Army you will never get those boys to enlist. I do not care if you raise it to $24, I do not care if you raise it to $28 per month, you will not get the men much faster. I will agree that it may stimulate en-listments in hard times, but men would rather work for somebody else after they know what service in the Regular Army is at less wages than to work for the Government. Now, let us see how you can get them. I venture the assertion that if some practical man will work this out and say to the boys in every State in the Union, "We are going to establish an Army post in each State. There is going to be a distinctive, natty uniform; that the years of enlistment are going to be six; that you are going to serve two years with the colors and that during those two years we are not only going to teach you how to drill, how to ride, how to shoot, how to pitch tents and dig trenches, but we are ging to teach you something else. We are going to teach you something that will stay with you and benefit you when you go out. We will teach you agriculture, we will teach you how to become a blacksmith, or how to become a mechanical engineer. We will teach you mathematics, and grammar, and writing. Why, these retired officers are running around here doing nothing, and everyone of them could be used in this educational department in each State in the Union, and if you would let the young country fellow know that he can go to his own State, associate with boys of his own State, that he would be near his home while he is being trained as a soldier and that he could get some finishing touches put on his education, you would have to take a baseball bat and stand in front of the recruiting office and beat them away instead of going out and expending millions of dollars to get soldiers for the Regular Army. [Applause.] That is what is the matter with the Regular Army. You do not offer the young Americans anything. They do not want to become drones and you mold them just like you mold bullets.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD, Yes.

Mr. FARR. These opportunities the gentleman describes are given to boys in the Navy, and yet we are 25,000 short.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; that is true in a measure of the Navy; but what would be the condition of your personnel if it had not been for the institution of these schools by Secretary Daniels?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this particular subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

Mr. HOWARD. Under the leave granted me I desire to incorporate as appropriate to this discussion a copy of an article I wrote last year for one of our daily journals in which I went into detail as to the plan for really building up a standing and reserve army in this country of at least 500,000 trained-to-theminute men:

"My experience on the Military Affairs Committee has convinced me that there are many abuses, uneconomic policies, and lack of cohesion in the administration of the affairs of the War Department. We get too little for the amount we expend, the per capita cost being in excess of $1,000 per annum.

"Then, again, our present system creates no nucleus for a reserve army of trained men that may be mustered into the service upon short notice in formidable numbers for defensive purposes.

"Further than this, we are using too many of our officers in purely clerical positions in the War Department. These officers are drawing large salaries; they attained their military training at a cost of $16,000 each to the people; and in view of the continued shortage of Army officers they should be in the field performing the duties they were educated to perform and leave such departmental service to civilian employees.

"I have collaborated with one of the most brilliant young officers in the American Army on a practical plan for the future Army. I feel that I would be unfair to this splendid officer if I did not state that every professional detail of this plan should be accredited to him.

"The cost of this plan, in my judgment, will not be over thirty millions additional a year. It gives adequate security to the Nation. It will stimulate interest in military affairs; and I confidently submit it to the people as sound from a military standpoint, from a patriotic standpoint, and most economical in every detail.

"A great many measures upon military preparedness, pro and con, will be introduced in Congress, which will tend toward mental confusion; but if each thinking American will make himself conversant with the defects of our present Military Establishment and our military needs, in the light of the recent lessons given us by the present world war, public opinion will soon intelligently express the will of the thinking people, and certain general plans of action will be accepted, others rejected, all of which will tend to prevent the referred-to mental confusion in Congress.

"I propose to first ask you to accept a universally acknowledged military principle, then I will discuss, first, the defects of our present Military Establishment; second, our military needs; third, the present proposed changes to meet these accepted needs; and I will conclude by outlining for your consideration my plan above referred to, and will discuss its merits from every angle.

"Two weeks ago England announced that no troops who have not had at least one year of constant training would be sent to the front. In other words, war has become a science demanding, more so than heretofore, that even the private be scientifically educated and trained, which can not be accomplished in less than one year of continuous service with the colors. This is the acknowledged military principle I must ask you to accept. Since we have been in the past successful in all our wars without acknowledging this principle, a fallacy has grown up in this country that a brave man with a gun is a soldier. Any nation that sends its untrained sons in this day and time to the front to face a scientifically trained and educated army commits ignominious murder. Our military history also proves this principle, but our final successes have caused us not to notice or realize the great unnecessary cost in blood of all our wars. I ask you to accept with me this military principle, not only in order to prevent our sons from being sent untrained to war and ignominiously murdered, but also because the ultimate fate of this Nation might be endangered in any war if we should meet a scientifically trained and educated army with troops of less than one year's training.

"I will now briefly discuss the most glaring defects of our present Military Establishment. A regiment of our Infantry— and Infantry is the backbone of the Army—on paper during peace times consists of 12 companies of 65 men each. A regiment is commanded by 50 officers. This number of officers would not be increased at the outbreak of war, but each company would be increased by 95 untrained men, making each company 150 men in number of each regiment 1,800 strong. Thus we see the peace efficiency of the Regular Army would be nullified at the very outbreak of war by being swamped with untrained men. if 50 officers are necessary to command 1,800 men during war, but only train a regiment of 780 men during peace times, we are not using our plant at its maximum efficiency or speed. During business depressions the recruiting officers have no trouble keeping each company at a strength of 65 men, but during prosperous times men will not enlist, and companies decrease in strength, often as low as 20 men per company, and are officered and trained by, theoretically, 50 officers. Therefore we see our system is extravagant, if we compare the amount of protection it affords us with the money we spend on it. It resembles a commercial plant running at less than two-fifths of its capacity. Such a condition of affairs proves, first, we are not now during peace reaching the proper voluntary enlisting spring of the Nation, and, second, our plant would only be running at two-fifths its capacity, even should we be able to get 65 men for each of our companies.

"The keeping up of our numerous small posts causes unnecessary expenditures from every point of view. Many of them are distant from our great strategical points, which in most cases are our largest recruiting centers, thus causing large transportation expenditures in sending the men to these numerous and distant small posts and at the end of three or four years returning them to the enlisting places. By saving this unnecessary transportation hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved each year. The country is crowded with small posts, the upkeep of which costs immense sums. By selling these small Army posts, with this money for larger commands, a saving would accrue, because a brigade post could be maintained at a less cost than three regimental posts. Also it is cheaper to feed 1,800 men than it is to feed three groups of 600 men each.

"When we consider the numerous enlistments during hard times and the few enlistments during prosperous times we come to the conclusion that a great part of the Army is recruited from an undesirable element, which has a tendency to cause the profession to be looked down upon by the layman, whereas it should be looked up to. This undesirable element also contaminates a great many young men, especially those from the South and Middle West, who enlist to go abroad to see the country. This deleterious condition should be corrected at once.

Now we come to a more vital defect. It will be the future policy of this country to rely in time of great national danger upon the discharged soldiers, and during peace the Army should be a school turning out a certain number of trained soldiers each year; these men to constitute the great reserve army to which the country looks for protection when war is declared, and not to the small standing army. Since our Army is turning out trained soldiers at the present time at less than two-fifths out trained soldiers at the present time at less than two-fifths its capacity and about 30 per cent of the discharged soldiers reenlist, thus reducing the number available for the reserves, we see that the present system if continued will never supply us with a reserve army, and we will be forced to send our un-trained sons forth to fight our battles and be defeated and mur-When we take a pencil and paper and figure the number of trained men our military plant could, by running on a maximum-number basis, transfer to the reserves each year we see that the Army is too small to serve this end, the end being to supply us with trained men for a reserve army of 300,000 men, which our military experts tell us is necessary to make this country secure from invasion. Also when we study the personnel of any regiment we find it composed of men from practically every State in the Union, and a practical mind will at once see the impossibility of keeping 'tab' on these men when they are discharged and return to the four corners of our country. To keep a record of 300,000 discharged soldiers, assigned to and discharged from scattered regiments in the heterogeneous manner that is now in vogue, would require an army of clerks.

"Now, let us discuss our military needs. Our War and Staff Colleges tell us convincingly that in case our fleet was destroyed or rendered useless, say, by being in the Pacific Ocean when it should be in the Atlantic, or vice versa, and the Panama Canal out of commission, certain strong military nations have, individually, sufficient merchant marine to land a complete army of 300,000 men, out of range of our coast defenses, capture them from the rear, and immediately, unopposed, capture the adjacent cities (New York not being excepted), and they notify us that our greatest possible military need is to be sufficiently strong in organized and trained men to render such an invasion from any nation impossible. Hence it is clearly the duty of Congress to provide this Nation with sufficient protection to make such an invasion impossible, and to do so in the most economical manner as regards money and men permanently withdrawn from civil life. These military experts convince us that to secure the desired amount of necessary protection our mobile army should be increased by 10 regiments of Infantry and 4 regiments of Field Artillery, the National Guard rendered more assistance and thus made more efficient, and that we should have an organized, officered, and trained reserve army of 400,000 soldiers. I think these demands are sufficiently modest, reasonable, and can be economically supplied.

"Then, let us now take up and discuss the different proposed measures which would supply us with the desired Regular Army increase, an efficient National Guard, and a reserve army of 400,000 men. To date all proposed plans for increasing our Regular Army have passed over this vital issue by saying: 'We will increase our Regular Army by 10 regiments of Infantry and 4 regiments of Field Artillery,' but they do not tell us what spring of national impulse or sentiment to press during prosperous times to obtain these additional men or even the present authorized number of men. All of these proposed plans contemplate continuing to operate our expensive Army plant at two-fifths its capacity; they do not attempt to settle the question of selling or abandoning our undesirable posts and placing our small Army at strategical points; they do not correct our present extravagant transportation expenditures by working out a sane plan of assigning and discharging our soldiers, which would also keep them available for reserve use. No plan so far has figured out what economical changes can be effected in our Regular Army, and how this money saving can be used to partially offset the additional expense of increasing the Army. Until these questions are considered and corrected, to increase our regular mobile army would be unwise.

"All appear agreed upon the plan of assisting and improving the National Guard by paying them when in camp from both the State and Federal Treasury, and it is certain that this would be of some assistance. However, I do not think such an expenditure a wise one until we correct certain defects in the National Guard system as it now exists. We should change the National Guard so as to make it dovetail into any radical change in our military policy. The spending of Federal money upon inefficient National Guard troops that can never become efficient should not be allowed, but the spending of the Federal money upon even inefficient National Guard organizations situated so that they can be made efficient should commence at once. By efficient National Guard I mean an efficiency possible of being attained at the end of two years' service, which would be equivalent to a degree of efficiency obtainable by one would be equivalent to a degree of emiciency obtainable by one year of continuous service. You see I adhere, and ask you to adhere, to our accepted principle that we can not use untrained troops in modern wars, and I will not willingly consent to Federal money being spent except in carrying out this principle. ciple. No plan of assisting our National Guard proposed to date that I know of takes cognizance of the fact that some National Guard organizations have attained an efficiency almost equal to our Regular Army, while other organizations have for years decreased in efficiency and have been juggled around to meet

State and city politics.

'Some cities, having an unusual boosting spirit, have increased their complement of National Guard organizations to such an extent that they have been unable to keep them efficient, because interest soon subsided. To spend Federal money on such organizations would not be to our interest; but to reduce, say, a lightly recruited and inefficient regiment to a battalion which could take care of all the men previously in the regiment and then spend the Federal money in making that battalion as efficient as our Regular Army is highly desirable. The only injustice that such a step could cause would be in the letting out of the National Guard of a great many officers who have spent time and money in the same. However, these men should be taken care of in the reserve army. So instead of enlarging our National Guard and paying it out of our Federal Treasury I favor first putting it in some cases in such condition that it can become highly efficient and then rendering it Federal aid. I believe such a plan would serve best the interests of both the Federal and State Governments and meet with approval from all National Guard officers. This would not affect those splendid regiments of National Guard that have attained a high degree of efficiency but would assist them in the manner they are now asking of Congress.

"Numerous schemes have been proposed for securing our reserve army of 400,000 civilians and securing officers for the same. Most of these plans prove to be theoretical and not practical upon examination. They do not recognize the defects in our present recruiting system, nor do they take into consideration the abroard of the same of the sideration the abnormal amount of interest in this subject caused by the atmosphere being electrified by the present world war and appreciate that this interest will subside when the war is over. I dismiss Gen. Wood's scheme of using our business men right here by asking if you believe that 10 years from now, when the world war is over and the atmosphere is not electrified with war, will it be possible to get the mayor of New York and 1,000 of the leading men of that city to go to Plattsburg and spend one month under canvas learning to become soldiers? Look back 10 years and see if such a camp was possible. It is also impossible because it violates our accepted military principle by attempting to make reserve officers out of these gentlemen by a month's training each year.

"The scheme now being proposed by the Secretary of War for reserve army of 400,000 civilians is as follows: Every year 133,000 civilians would be asked to enlist for three years with the colors and three years on furlough, but during the three years with the colors would be required to undergo an intensive service for a short period of one or two months, and the rest of the year they are civilians to all intents and purposes. This plan I consider impractical, for the following reasons:

"First. It does not contemplate using the men we discharge from our expensive Regular Army plant as reserves, nor does it contemplate changing our present Regular Army defect so as to make it possible to use these men or operate the plant at its maximum efficiency.

"Second. As soon as the present abnormal interest aroused in military affairs subsides I do not believe we can enlist 133,000 men a year during prosperous times and ask them to give us one or two months of their time each year for three yearsthis in addition to the enlistments necessary for our increased Regular Army and our increased National Guard that the plan also contemplates.

"Third. The keeping tab on these 400,000 men would require an army of clerks, and to date no satisfactory scheme has been devised to accomplish it.

"Fourth. It violates our accepted principle and means we would permit them to be murdered if they were ever called upon to face a trained army. Such a scheme has been successfully used in Switzerland, which is a small country, and the complement enlisting each year with the colors includes all the men of a certain age; but 133,000 men each year would not include one-fifth of our available men of any specified age, and this fact alone would defeat its successful application in this coun-We know too well how ultra polite each young man would be during prosperous times when the Government would ask for the 133,000 recruits. I fear there would be a great deal of nudging and bowing to the other fellow, with the remark, 'After you, my dear Gaston.' We must recognize the fact that a successful system of a small republic will not of necessity meet the different existing conditions found in a large republic without radical modifications.

"Now, we come to the solution of the problem that I propose to submit to the American people for their consideration. I desire to say that I am in accord with the administration as regards the amount of increase necessary for the Regular Army, also the general idea of the administration as to extending to the National Guard a helping hand and as to the size and necessity of our reserve army. However, I differ with others in that I do not believe that a practical plan that will attain the desired end has as yet been submitted. I would not criticize other plans were I not able, in my opinion, to submit a better one, which is economical as regards money and men withdrawn from civil life, and which hurts no one, but benefits many not at present benefited.

"Recognizing that our present voluntary system of enlistment is a failure during prosperous peace times, we ought to bring other forces to play on the recruiting element of the Nation when we consider increasing our Regular Army. Where can such a force possible of utilization be found? I believe it can be found during peace in State patriotism, loyalty, pride, or enthusiasm. I do not mean to say that we as a Nation have no Federal patriotism, loyalty, pride, or enthusiasm, but I do say that these elements lie dormant within us during peace only to burst forth with fury and make State patriotism secondary when war is I believe this State spirit is the strongest potential force possible of utilization during peace, prosperous, and hard times that the Government has with which to solve Regular Army, National Guard, and reserve army problems. And I base my entire plan on the possibility of its successful utilization. "In utilizing this State spirit my plan calls for an Army post in each State, and the Regular Army organizations, after being increased as now contemplated, assigned permanently as Federal troops to the different States. This assignment to States would be on the general basis of the number of recruits now being obtained from the respective States. Understand that the State governments themselves would have nothing whatsoever to do with these organizations. These Regular Army organizations will be recruited to war strength, the men to serve two years with the colors and to be then placed in the State organized reserves for four years, during which time they would receive a small monthly allowance from the Federal Government and be required once each year to report for field training. These discharged men would constitute my national reserve army.

"I presume you are now asking, 'But how do you propose to get the recruits for this Army?' I will answer this question and probably others by illustrating the general application of the plan in the State of Georgia. From the recruiting data of the State of Georgia, based on both prosperous and hard times, we would at least have assigned to this State our permanent Coast Artillery garrisons and one regiment of Infantry, this regiment consisting of 1,800 men, divided into 12 companies of 150 men each. These men would enlist for six years, but only serve with the colors for two years and then four years in the Georgia reserves. This regiment would forever be called, say, the Twentieth Georgia Infantry. It would forever, when not on foreign service for two years or on the border, be stationed at Fort McPherson, Ga. Let it have a distinctive, natty, inexpensive, full-dress uniform. Let the officers understand that they are permanently assigned to this regiment. All the recruits would be Georgians, and all recruiting officers would be extra Infantry or Coast Artillery officers of the Twentieth Georgia Infantry and the Georgia Coast Artillery companies. Now, what would be the results? Soon all Georgia would take an interest in her regiment of Infantry and Coast Artillery companies and a competitive spirit would spring up between all the States. This would cause a Georgia esprit de corps in Twentieth Georgia Infantry Regiment, and this esprit would increase as the interest of the State of Georgia increased. The disadvantages of separation from loved ones and family that attend an enlistment in the present Regular Army would not exist, and a father would not object to his son enlisting and receiving the benefits of two years' military training when he knows his son would in all probability reside the two years in the State of Georgia at Fort McPherson and upon the termination of his service would return to him at once. These sons would be given a two weeks' or a month's furlough each year, and could then visit their homes and assist with the crops, and so forth. The very presence of these men on furlough in their home towns, in their natty full-dress uniforms, sober, straight, and erect, would offer positive evidence of the benefits to be derived from military training, would stimulate enlisting, and would quicken the pride of all Georgians. And what is true in Georgia is true in all other States.

"I would add to the now known benefits derived from military training that of teaching each man a profession during his two years at Fort McPherson, I would conduct a school corresponding to any public school in the State; also a school for carpenters, bricklayers, mechanics, blacksmiths, surveyors, typewriting, and so forth. Every man would be required to attend one of these schools. The higher officers of the regiment and recruiting officers would be asked to cooperate with the chambers of commerce, and the spirit of Georgia would then pervade the entire regiment. I would send a crack company to all the large State affairs. I would, as far as practicable, even assign men from the same sections of Georgia to the same companies, so that a young man joining the regiment would be living in the same room and messing at the same table with his friends, and mothers would know their sons to be among friends of the family and cared for by them in case of sickness. If this system presses the desired enlisting spring of the Nation, Georgia If this syswould be able to supply, according to recent enlisting data, at least her Coast Artillery companies and two regiments of Infantry each 1,800 strong.

"Of course, as you see, the plan first corrects the enlisting defects of our present Army, and you can not support it unless you believe it corrects this defect. Let us now discuss its application to the reserves. All men would, of course, enlist for six years, two with the colors and four in the reserves, which would cause approximately 900 men to go to the Georgia reserves each year and would give us about 3,600 men, or two reserve Georgia regiments. Most of these men would reside in Georgia, thus making it possible to keep in touch with them and mobilize them in a very short time (possibly not over three days), and certainly in a very economical manner. Their clothing (especially shoes), rifles, and other accounterments would be in perfect condition at Fort McPherson in lockers, and to put our reserves in uniform would be only a question of an hour after their arrival. Each reserve soldier would receive $2 a month during the four years of his reserve service. This would insure and make possible the keeping track of the whereabouts of each man every month, and the pay of $2 to every reserve man would drop into his lap out of a clear sky each month, thus keeping up his interest in his military career and stimulating enlisting in his community. We must not expect something which is efficient and worth having for nothing; if we want the service and protection of 300,000 trained reserve men we must be willing to make a reasonable payment for the same. Some few reserve men would, of course, move out of the State of Georgia; in these cases they would be transferred direct to the reserve of the State to which they moved by the commanding officer of the Georgia reserves. The commanding officer of the Georgia reserve regiments would be a high-ranking Regular Army officer, who should have an office force of not over two assistants, one from the Infantry and one from the Coast Artillery.

"To obtain the necessary number of trained officers to command the two regiments of reserve Infantry and the reserve companies of Coast Artillery of the State of give preference to the officers of the National Guard of Georgia. When I reduced slightly the number of organizations of the National Guard, there would be an excess of National Guard officers, and to these men I would offer commissions in the reserve regiments and Coast Artillery companies, subject, of course, to mental and physical examination. These reserve officers would, of course, receive a small monthly salary. For the rest of the reserve officers I would take the honor graduates of the military schools of this State, pay them $100 a month for a year, during which time they would serve as additional lieutenants in the Twentieth Georgia Infantry and Georgia Coast Artillery companies. At the end of the year these officers would be transferred to the reserves and assigned to companies. Once this system is started, the number of men to be accepted as officers from the military institutions of the State would vary according to the vacancies. At the end of the first year of the system we would require sufficient officers to command 900 men, the second year 1,800 men, the third year 2,700 men, the fourth year 3,600 men. So by using one to five honor graduates of each military school each year and the National Guard officers we could have a corps of trained officers sufficient in size at the end of four years to officer the reserve organizations. These officers would know their men, and esprit de corps in each reserve regiment would soon be noticed. honor graduate assigned to Company A, Twentieth Georgia Infantry, as an additional second lieutenant, upon the completion of his year of training, should be assigned to Company A of one of the reserve regiments. Likewise all enlisted men of Company A, Twentieth Georgia Regulars, upon being transferred to the reserves, should be assigned to Company A of one of the reserve regiments. This system would soon create an esprit, de corps in the companies of the reserve regiment. Officers and men would look forward to the yearly maneuvers as a reunion. They would then meet and rub elbows with the men with whom they served for two years; reserve officers would be commanding in many cases the men they commanded during their one year. The entire system would blend toward real efficiency.

"When the President desired to mobilize the Nation's military forces one telegram only to each State would be necessary. The reserves of each State could be mobilized, clothed, and armed certainly within a week, and the President could mobilize a trained and educated army of over 300,000 men at any strategical point on either coast within three weeks from the date of ordering the mobilization. This is brought about because the plan works automatically to this end when we study it. Take New York State, for instance: It is at present our greatest recruiting center; hence it would have the largest number of Regular Army and reserve organizations. The States adjacent to New York are naturally densely populated, and therefore would have a fairly large number of Regular Army and reserve organizations, all of which makes possible the concentration at New York of a large number of troops at a moment's notice and also at a very small cost. Also we find that the system eliminates the present deleterious condition of having the young boys from the farms in the South and West serving with and being influenced by some of the undesirable element enlisting in some of our large cities. It also works our small Army plant at its maximum capacity.

"How would the system work when applied to our foreignservice conditions? Foreign service is very popular with our soldiers. As soon as it is definitely known that a certain regiment is scheduled for a tour abroad the regiment is at once filled with recruits. Hence, when our First Georgia Regiment is scheduled for two years abroad, and at the end of which time is to be returned to us at Atlanta with our sons, we would be only too glad to permit our sons to take advantage of the splendid opportunity of seeing the world. Especially would this be so when we realized the regiment was to be officered by sober, honest, and efficient officers. The system eliminates two very grave existing conditions. It takes the question of where troops are to be stationed and the elimination of many of our undesirable posts out of politics. Each State would have only one post for its mobile army troops; and by mobile army troops I mean all troops except those in the Coast Artillery.

"This system would greatly benefit the National Guard. The discharged reserves would be encouraged at all times in associating themselves with the National Guard. Soon the National Guard organizations would consist mostly of men who would have completed their six years regular service. These men would join the National Guard in order to attend the encamp-ments and see their friends again if for no other reason. Understand that I would at the commencing of this system only reduce the National Guard organization at places where it has been clearly demonstrated that the guard organizations are below the required strength per company or where they are very inefficient. In these cases I would simply request fewer organizations, say the transferring of all the men of a weak regiment into four strong companies or a battalion. However, I would take care of the officers eliminated as mentioned above.

"From an economical standpoint the system is well within reason. The real economy can only be realized when you figure the additional security attained by having the Army plant running at full capacity and a reserve army of 300,000 trained and officered soldiers (not civilians), and compare this class of security and what you pay for it with that attained by having your plant running at two-fifths of its capacity, a reserve of 400,000 citizens, and what it costs you.

"The visible economical features are listed below:

"First. Men to-day are sent from the place of enlistment to different and very often distant regiments, and upon being discharged are returned to the place of enlistment, which averages one-half the distance across the continent. This item of expenditure, which runs into hundreds of thousands of dollars each year, would be eliminated.

"Second. At present each soldier has the same money clothing allowance, because he is liable to be called upon to serve in any Under the proposed plan there would be no occasion for southern troops to have a money allowance for clothing as large as the New England troops. Likewise the money allowance for clothing of the New England troops could be reduced, because they would not require certain articles of clothing necessary for southern wear. By carrying out this idea a large saving could be made.

"Third. Officers would remain with the regiments and the present large officers' mileage expenditures could be practically eliminated.

"Fourth A corresponding saving on the freight bills for officers' household effects would be made as their mileage expenditures are reduced.

"Fifth. It is cheaper to feed 1,800 men than it is to feed three separate groups of 600 men, as we are doing now.

"Sixth. The cost of keeping up a post for a large command is less per man than keeping up three posts for the same number "Seventh. The cost of mobilizing troops for maneuvers would be less than it is now, because in practically every State by assembling Regulars, Reserves, and the National Guard a brigade maneuver could be held each year, and by combining the adjacent States a division or corps maneuver could be held every two years, and in each class of maneuvers the distance required to move the troops is less than at present. In other words, there would be a sufficient uniform distribution of our force over the country for this purpose.

"Eighth. By selling the undesirable and useless Army posts sufficient funds could be secured to enlarge the remaining ones and to build the new ones necessary and still have funds on Fully two-thirds of the States have at least one post possible of utilization if we adopt this plan.

"If at any time the Government considered the Army plan turning out too many reserves, it would be reduced by only having 100 or 125 men in each company. Any reduction below 100 men to a company is believed unwise. On the other hand, if it is found that not enough men are supplied for the reserves a limited number could no doubt be attained by calling on civilians to enlist in the reserves, as the President now con-templates. However, if over 20 per cent of the reserves enter thus as untrained civilians, it would reduce the efficiency of the reserves to an undesirable point. Also a provision should be inserted permitting reserve men to reenlist in the reserve when the reserves are not at authorized strength.

"Let us now figure how our plan would work out:

Regular Army.  Forty regiments of Infantry, at 1,800 each.  Fifteen regiments of Cavalry, at 1,200 each.  Ten regiments of Field Artillery, at 1,000 each.  Two hundred and ten companies of Coast Artillery, at 100 each.	21,000
Three battalions Engineer troops, at 500 each	1,500 500
Total	120, 000

Two times this number, or 240,000, will give us the strength of the reserve army. The 120,000 in the Regular Army does not include the native regiments in our insular possessions or the special troops, such as those in the Quartermaster, Ordnance, and Signal Corps, and so forth.

"Our National Guard, after being reduced, will amount to a trifle over 100,000. So our total available strength possible of mobilization would be 440,000 men, less those on foreign service. We could eventually increase our militia by 60,000 as the reserve soldiers terminated their six years' service, and then we would have our 500,000 trained and officered soldiers, which amount of preparedness should render us forever free from even the fear of an invader's heel. If we accept this plan we avoid the evils of a large standing Army and at the same time make ourselves secure against attack, at only a small increase over our present military expenditures. We also improve morally, physically, and mentally a large percentage of our population, whose earning capacity will be sufficiently increased to warrant the expenditures."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words

I would like unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes, and I want to make a statement here before I start. There has been a very serious attack made in this House by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] upon men who hold opinions such as I do, and I desire to proceed for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

BAILEY] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. BAILEY. On the general subject that is under discussion now

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, unless some other gentleman desires to discuss the question while we are on this paragraph, I will ask that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania all debate on this paragraph be closed.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman— The CHAIRMAN. That will have to be put as a separate proposition. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Balley]. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none

The gentleman from Alabama prefers a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DENT. That at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at the termination of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed. Is there objection?

[After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 20

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, for one, I wish to hurl back the charge of cowardice flung at the advocates of peace by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. GARDNER. When did I accuse you or any other advocate of peace of cowardice?

Mr. BAILEY. I will quote your language later, if you please.

I do not care to be diverted just now.

It takes more courage than was ever conceived of in the philosophy of swashbuckling shoulder-strappers to face the mob and to bring to bear upon it the forces of reason and justice. Is that courage which enables the soldier to march up to the cannon's mouth the only or the greatest courage which men may show? No; a thousand times no. There is a brute courage and there is also a moral courage. There is the courage of the bulldog, the courage of the tomcat, the courage of the cock sparrow, the courage of a reptile which attacks another reptile. But is this courage such as to inspire our loftiest admiration? Is it the sort of courage we try to develop and strengthen in our children? Who is the greater hero-he that taketh a city or he that conquereth his own soul?

The gentleman from Massachusetts may arrogate to himself a heroism that he denies to men like William Jennings Bryan, Henry Ford, David Starr Jordan, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Callaway]. But I am here to say that any one of these is possessed of a spirit of heroism as far surpassing that before which the gentleman from Massachusetts prostrates himself as day surpasses night. The heroism which enthralls the gentleman from Massachusetts is that of the jungle.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield? I call the gentleman's attention to the rule of the House which says that a Member shall proceed in order and avoid personalities. I do not object to a reasonable amount of criticism.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he proceeded in order the other day when he branded those who stand for peace as cowards and allies of Germany. [Applause.]
Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman can point out a single case in which I transgressed the rights of the House, all right. shall ask the Chair to rule that the gentleman proceed in order and avoid personalities. I do not object to a reasonable amount of criticism, but I do not want the whole speech directed toward

Mr. BAILEY. What is the particular language the gentleman objects to?

Mr. GARDNER. I call the attention of the Chairman to the rule of the House which says that in debate a Member must avoid personalities.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope this will not be taken out of my time,

Mr. GARDNER. I call attention to Rule XIV, which says:

SEC. 734. When any Member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and on being recognized may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personalities.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, of course, the general rule is perfectly well understood that there must be a measure of decorum and propriety in debate which the Chair must enforce. There is also a latitude of argument and latitude of reply. What is the particular language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania which is objected to as being an impingement on the rule cited?

Mr. GARDNER. It was the general fact that he seemed to be making me the butt of all his remarks. I never knew the gentleman, even by sight, until the other day, when he was in the chair, and I never mentioned his name on the floor of the House or elsewhere that I know of. Well, I do not care. Let him go on. [Laughter.] Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the heroism Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the neroism which enthralls the gentleman from Massachusetts is that of the jungle. That is what I repeat, and I am willing to stand by it.

That which inspires men like William Jennings Bryan is the heroism of faith, of service, of love, of justice, of human kindness, of all-embracing brotherhood.

Mr. GARDNER. Is there a rule of the House, Mr. Chairman, that requires me to remain and hear the gentleman?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; you are excused, with my compliments. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts, echoing the voice of the metropolitan press and of the military satrapy which seeks to replace the ideals of the Republic with those of the principalities and powers which are now drinking at the fountains of blood, bewails the fact that the American people are taking counsel among themselves regarding this momentous issue which he wishes to be determined without their knowledge or their consent. He would silence those who can not accept the gospel of the claw and the fang which he preaches with such vehe-There is to be no counsel save that of the war lords; no voice heard except that of the munition maker; no suggestion offered save by what may be usurped authority. believes with the Washington Post that death should be decreed against every American citizen who dares in this crisis of the Nation to speak the word of soberness in an effort to curb the mob spirit to which militarism always and everywhere His whole attack on those who believe the people should have some voice in a matter affecting their most vital interests is based on the assumption that only the war lords should be heard in such an emergency. He thinks that only cravens and cowards would question the word of those who settle disputes with the sword and who dispose of issues involving the national honor with 16-inch guns. Yet there is a bravery above that of the barracks, a courage finer than that of the cavalier, a heroism more splendid than that of the man on horseback. It is the bravery of the man who faces the mob: it is the courage of the man who confronts the serried ranks of prejudice; it is the heroism of the soul which rises superior to the shafts of ridicule and malevolence in the cause of right and justice.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts conjures those who believe in the possibility of a peaceful solution of the pending problem to "stand by the President." But is he "standing by the President"? The President is hoping and striving to avoid war. With a matchless poise and patience he has thrown his incomparable influence on the side of peace. By every means at his command he is endeavoring to steer the ship of state through troubled waters to a safe harbor. Yet here is the gentleman from Massachusetts and those for whom he speaks going to extravagant lengths in their efforts to balk him and to force him to enter the war as an ally of the allies. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes no concealment of his purpose. He is at least frank, open, aboveboard. He does not beat about the bush.

I wish he were here to listen to this tribute.

He hates Germany with a consuming hatred. His heart is with Britain, and he wants to plunge his country into war as an aid to King George in his struggle to destroy Germany. Yet he has the consummate effrontery to stand on this floor before the American people and asperse the good faith of those who wish this country to remain neutral and to avoid a dangerous entanglement with the warring powers. He charges them with placing loyalty to Germany above their loyalty to America.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to this effect, that the gentleman is not talking to the amendment before the House. I agree with the gentleman largely in everything that he says, but I do not think that that last statement is fair or proper.

Mr. BAILEY. It is as fair as the gentleman— Mr. KING. Therefore I ask for a ruling on the question. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is addressing the House along the line which he proposed to speak.

Mr. KING. He is not discussing the amendment proposed by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment?

Mr. KING.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand when he got permission of the House that he was to discuss the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KING. He said he was going to talk on this bill when he got the consent. The gentleman has no right to accuse any Member of this House of being a subject of King George, no matter who he is.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman raises a question of Mr. KING. I do raise the question.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. POU. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was asked what he was going to speak on, and he said "the general subject." That was a part of and a preliminary condition to the request that he made for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is the way he understood the request of the gentleman.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, that was asked by reason of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] reserved the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe unanimous consent was given for the discussion of just a pro forma amendment.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention also to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania distinctly stated that he wanted to reply to strictures that had been made by gentlemen on his views

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words I referred to be taken down.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the gentleman is too late. He has made a point of order on the scope of the discussion, and that has been discussed and ruled on, and now it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not rule that the gentleman is too late to make the point of order. All this is occurring along the same line. The Clerk will read from the desk the last words to which objection was made.

The Clerk read the words.

Mr. KING. Now, Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that a proper parliamentary speech in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to report that back to the House.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that these remarks will not be taken down if they are made at me. I do not mind the gentleman saying that I have a greater loyalty to Great Britain than to the United States.

Mr. KING. The gentleman can not withdraw my inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Saunders, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, objection was made to certain language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Balley], who had the floor; that a request was made that those words be taken down, and they were taken down, and that he desired to report the words.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words.

The Clerk again read the words.

The SPEAKER. What is the will of the House?

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Balley] be permitted to proceed in

Mr. EMERSON. What does the gentleman mean by "in order "?

Mr. HENSLEY. Let the Speaker pass upon that.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words be stricken

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the words complained of be stricken from the RECORD. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KING. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division. Those who are in favor of striking these words from the Record will, when their names are called, answer "aye"; those opposed will answer "no."

The House divided; and there were-ayes 58, noes 31.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. Mr. KEATING. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker. The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 58 and the noes

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Two or three gentlemen make the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of striking these words from the Record will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 167, nays 126, answered "present" 24, not voting 116, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bailey] from the Record is agreed to. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 20783) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. BAILEY, Mr. Chairman— Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me, in the middle of his speech, to ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes on a matter entirely unrelated to any of the matters now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania

Certainly, with pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks two minutes for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in a sort of a way the House itself is a grandfather. When Genevieve Clark Thompson was married the Members of the House presented her with a very beautiful wedding present. She is now the mother of a son, Champ Clark Thompson. [Applause.] I think it would be very appropriate for the Members of the House, under the circumstances, to give to this grandson of the Speaker and of the House a little present in the form of a cup, a knife, a fork, and a spoon. This morning I had Mr. Shaw bring up to the Capitol, having received them by directions from New York, these implements in gold, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Lloyd] and myself, constituting ourselves a committee, went and inspected the articles. If there be no objection from the Members of the House, we ask the Members to contribute voluntarily a dollar apiece. [Applause.] That is in order that we may make this present with the appropriate inscriptions. If there be no objection, we will ask some of the employees of the House to go around to the Members and collect the money. The articles will be displayed before they are

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] will proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, owing to the very considerable delay that has been occasioned by this tempest in a teapot, and inasmuch as I feel that I have succeeded in making the point that I desired to make, I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the remainder of my speech; and I will say that I will modify it in accordance with the expression of the House. [Applause.]

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Go ahead.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have taken up enough time already. do not want to delay the public business, and shall not do so if I am given this permission. Otherwise I will

Mr. MANN. I think no one will object if the gentleman will say that there will be no personalities left in his speech.

Mr. BAILEY. I have stated that I would modify my remarks in accordance with the expression of the House. I would like to say this, however, that I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner] should likewise agree to modify his remarks. [Applause.]

I want to say this, if the Chair pleases—
Mr. GARDNER. In what respect does the gentleman think

I should modify my remarks?

Mr. BAILEY. May I proceed, Mr. Chairman, by reading the language to which I refer?

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection.

Mr. RAILEY. I still have time remaining, Mr. Chairman. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] said:

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, William Jennings Bryan proposes that we should prepare ourselves to present a united front to the enemy by first tearing the Nation asunder in a political campaign on the question of peace or war. He and his followers, the pacifists—

Of whom I am one, and I am not ashamed in this presence or any other to attest that fact [applause]- the extreme socialists, and those who place loyalty to Germany above loyalty to America, are engaged in appealing to the cowardice which lurks in every man's breast.

Mr. GARDNER. Let me ask the gentleman if I said or implied in any way that he or any other pacifist placed loyalty to Germany above loyalty to America?

Mr. BAILEY. I think the language was very plain. It seems

Mr. GARDNER. I do not agree with the gentleman. I

He and his followers-

That is, Bryan and his followersthe pacifists

There are pacifists-

the extreme socialists

And there are extreme socialists; that is another kind-other followers of Mr. Bryan-and those who place loyalty to Germany above loyalty to America-

And there are such people in this country. You are not one, because you are not German. There are many Germansare engaged in appealing to the cowardice which lurks in every man's breast.

If there is any reflection on the House of Representatives I shall cheerfully withdraw it, and if there is any reflection on any Member of the House of Representatives, if the gentleman will tell me where I had any gentleman in my mind when I spoke, I will cheerfully withdraw that; but I surely said nothing about any pacifist except that he was a follower of Mr. Bryan, and that he was appealing to the cowardice which lurks in men's breasts. I do not imply any cowardice on the part of pacifists. think the gentleman has missed that point.

Mr. BAILEY. As long as I have agreed to modify my remarks, I think the gentleman should agree to modify his.

Mr. GARDNER. Let me point out this distinction to the gentleman: It was the House, by a vote, that cut out the gentleman's remarks. That was not my case.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I know.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the gentleman from Massachusetts would be willing to have a vote taken whether his remarks should go out or not. The inference is perfectly plain that he charges the pacifists with a feeling of cowardice

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.
The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, to be modified so as to conform to the rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to enter my protest against any requests being made in the language in which the Chair has just stated it. The presumption is that every Member when he extends his remarks will deal fairly with the House and will put in remarks only that are in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that he was stating the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania exactly in the words used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WINGO. I am not criticizing the Chair, but I do not want the Record, in view of what has just taken place, to contain language so that when a man reads it, not being familiar with what has taken place, he may be misled. It only adds to the criticism of what has already taken place. I am not criticizing

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would have to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his request, then.

Mr. WINGO. I am not asking anybody to do anything. I am entering my protest.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WINGO. I do not. The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman is not in order. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsyl-

Mr. JAMES. I object unless it is understood that personalities are cut out of the speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated it as clearly as he can that the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and in that connection to conform his remarks, as far as personalities may be contained in them contrary to the rules of the House, to the rules.

Mr. WINGO. If the request is put in that language, I shall

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas objects to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left? Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be permitted to extend his remarks in the Record. I think the House will take what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank God for Woodrow Wilson and William Jennings Bryan in this hour of grave peril to republican institutions. I thank God for those men and women all over the land who refuse to bow at the feet of Mars at the call of the war mongers and the traffickers in munitions. I thank God for those really courageous souls who refuse to be silenced by an envenomed press which gets its inspiration from Wall Street and which would crucify every American who dares to plead in this hour of stress and strain for reason to assert herself rather than Perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that it is cowardice which impels me to vote against monstrous appropriations that must impose heavy burdens upon my people. Perhaps he thinks that it is cowardice that has directed me in protesting against compulsory military service. Perhaps he thinks cowardice explains the fact that all my life long I have stood four square against militarism in all its manifestations. Well, he is entitled to his own opinion in this regard. But how much easier would it be for me, Mr. Chairman, "to go along," to run with the mob, to shout with the hurrah boys, to let the tide of war sweep on unchallenged until it should engulf my beloved land and the ideals which have made it precious to every man who has caught the glowing vision of human free-Oh, how little is the courage required of the man who falls in behind the tumultuous crowd as it rushes on its reckless way! How little is the courage one must have to meet the call of the jungle. It is the call of civilization that tries. It is the call of humanity that brings the real test. It is the call of justice which applies the acid to our mettle.

I can understand why dogs fight. They know no better. can understand why the cock sparrow struggles with his rival until he dies. He is governed by his instinct and not by reason. But I can not understand why men fight, because men know better; they have the gift of reason, they know right from wrong, evil from good, justice from injustice. And men have, indeed, ceased to settle their personal differences by appeal to force. They no longer vindicate their honor by killing some one or getting killed. They no longer measure their valor by the number of victims they have sent to the cemetery. And there is none we so much despise to-day as the bully, the bad man, the chap that carries a gun and looks for trouble. We do not honor him. We do not make him the gorgeous and glittering center of our social life. He does not occupy the chief seat in our synagogues nor the first place at our feasts. No. We send him to jail. We put him on the rock pile. We drive him out of our peaceful communities. We point him out to our children as a horrible example. And we warn the youth of the land against following in his crooked courses.

Yet we magnify the name of the bully when he wears an epaulette and carries a sword. We hail him as a hero and savior. We decorate him with honors and ascribe to him qualities and aspirations that belong to the gods. We place him on a lofty pedestal and invite our children to look up and admire, if not to worship. We make of him an idol before which all the humble and the patriotic must bow if they would escape calumny.

Neither as a citizen nor as a Member of Congress have I reached the pass where anyone can put a gag in my mouth or a seal on my mind. I am still a free man, an American, a citizen, a soldier of the common good, whose only weapon is the sword of truth, whose only defense is the armor of justice. And in this hour of fear and foreboding I do not falter. My faith is unshaken. My courage is that of one who believes that ever the right comes uppermost and ever is justice done. go into this war across the waters or we can stay out of it, and it will take a higher courage to stay out of it than to plunge into it at the call of jingoism. We can go into it and help the kings and princes of the Old World in their mad struggle to strengthen their thrones and extend their dominions. We can get into it and underwrite the securities which Wall Street has taken for the billions loaned the allies. We can go into it and sacrifice the fair youth of our land, your boy and mine. it and fasten on those who shall come after us a burden of debt which will press them down for generations. We may go into it and say that we are doing it to vindicate a right which might be better vindicated by another appeal than to beak and talon. can get into it and enrich the soil of Europe with our best blood, while casting a shadow over a million American homes. We can get into it. We can go into it as we might go to a We can get into it with banners flying and with music working its magic in the heart of the multitude. But we can not go into it without paying the price. We can not go into it without some sacrifice. We can not go into it without leaving something behind which is more precious than any prize it were possible for us to gain in the trenches. We must leave behind American ideals, American hopes, American possibilities of service to a world gone mad with the lust for blood. We can not take these with us into the trenches. We can take with us thither only the things that flourish there, batreds and jealousies, misunderstandings and brute passions, malevolent spirits and hearts bursting with a desire to slay and destroy. That is what we must take there. We can not take our good offices, our helping hand, our leaves of healing. No. We must go red-handed, imbued with all that war instills into the hearts of its votaries, bent on achieving the ultimate in the destruction of human life and in the laying waste of fair lands and peaceful cities.

Is that what Americans have in mind? Is that their ambition? Is this the inspiration of the present hour? I say not so. I believe the American people are for peace. I believe they love the ideals of the Republic and hate those which jingoism holds up in its mailed hand. I believe that if the voice of the plain people of the Republic could be heard it would call a halt on the madness which would precipitate us into the very vortex of that maelstrom of blood that a world in its blind rage has let loose. And because I believe this and because I feel in my heart of hearts that the higher patriotism calls for counsels of prudence rather than those of passion, I am exerting all my humble influence, not to excite hatreds, not to multiply prejudices, not to suppress the urgings of reason, not to stimulate the grosser impulses, not to hurry the land into a fateful enterprise on a false quest, but to restrain the forces which make for evil, to check impulses which are sweeping Europe to her doom and to appeal to those loftier aspirations which can find fruitage only in peace.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. The order was that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania all debate be closed on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of military observers abroad: For the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign States at war, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $15,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the testimony of Adjt. Gen. McCain before the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to the number of men that have been enlisted. Two or three Members of the House in their remarks have seemed to indicate that they were of the opinion that under the present method adopted enlistments were not up to what was expected. I therefore desire to call the attention of the House to the testimony of Gen. McCain on pages 668 and 671 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs. In that testimony Gen. McCain has stated that the enlistments have been very gratifying since the reorganization under the act of June 3, 1916; that in the month of November the enlistments increased 900 over the month from October, and that throughout the five months since the act has been in effect the record of enlistments in the United States Army show there had been an increase of 2,000 a month. This increase takes into account all the men who have gone out of the Army by reason of death, resignation, and discharge on expiration of service or otherwise. He says further that he is satisfied that the increases will be even greater than that, and by the time of the present fiscal year that the United States Army will have all the men provided for in the national-defense act.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. Mr. KEARNS. I have noticed in the newspapers within the last few days that since the break with Germany there has been only three men enlisted. Is that true?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have no information on that subject. The rate of enlistment, so far as we have any record, has been

2,024 per month greater than it ever was before.

Mr. KEARNS. I have seen in two different newspapers the same statement, that since the break with Germany there has been only three men enlisted in the Army.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have no information on the subject, but if I can get it I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. KEARNS. Does this increase of 2,000 the gentleman speaks of include withdrawals?

Mr. CALDWELL. Two thousand over and above all of the withdrawals, deaths, and resignations, and Gen. McCain says that the enlistments during the last two months have been greater than those of the first three months.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman from New York will pardon me, it would be practically impossible to get the information that the gentleman from Ohio alludes to, because there are so many recruiting stations all over the country; every one would have to report separately, so you could not get the total enlistments at once.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the gentleman from Ohio refers to one recruiting station.

Mr. KEARNS. Oh, no; I am speaking about the enlistments in the United States. I read it in two different newspapers.

Mr. KAHN. I think the information is erroneous. It takes the War Department 30 days to get reports in from all the recruiting stations to know how many recruits have been enlisted.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. FIELDS. The papers could not possibly have it correct.
Mr. CALDWELL. The newspapers could not have official information, as a matter of fact. It is impossible, for the War Department does not know.

Mr. KEARNS. Remember, I am not claiming that it is true simply because I saw it in a newspaper.

Mr. CALDWELL. We will try to get the information for the gentleman in the course of the day.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, it all depends on what months you take as your standard of comparison. In December the total enlistment was 4,372-not the gain, but the total enlistments. It is true that the November enlistments were about 1,000 more than in October. The enlistments rose from 2,446 in October to 3,467 in November. However, in July the enlist-ments numbered 4,342, and they fell off nearly 2,000 by October. I hold in my hand a letter from The Adjutant General, dated January 26, 1917. A copy of it will be found in to-day's Record in connection with my remarks of February 15. According to Gen. McCain the actual strength of the entire Regular Army on December 31, 1916, based on the best data obtainable, was

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, according to Gen. McCain's testimony, on page 668, before the Military Affairs Committee, there were on the date the gentleman mentions one hundred and twelve thousand and odd instead of 109,000.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman may be right, but I will allow him to look over my shoulder at the letter which I hold in my hand. Will the gentleman observe the date, January 26, 1917, and the signature, that of Gen. McCain. He says:

The actual enlisted strength of the entire Regular Army on December 31, 1916, based on the best data now obtainable, is approximately 109,959

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, I think the figures to which he refers were based on the date of October 31 last year. It is smaller now than it was then.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I telephoned down to The Adjutant General's office and I found that on February 29, 1916, the number of enlisted men altogether was 93,438. selected the day of February 29 because that was the date of the last enlistment figures before the passage of the joint resolution of March 17, 1916, which aimed to increase the Army by about 20,000 men. That means, in other words, in the 10 months from February 29, 1916, to December 31, 1916, the Army has been increased by 16,521 men. On the average the increase has been at the rate of sixteen hundred and fifty a month.

This letter from Gen. McCain further says:

The authorized strength of the entire Army for the fiscal year ending une 30, 1917, under the provisions of the national-defense act is 33,166 men, not including the enlisted strength, 5,733, of the Philip-

Yet we have only 109,959 men, not including the Philippine Scouts. Therefore we are about 23,000 men short by the December figures. You can not get around those figures. To claim that you can enlist these men, and the increase of men due this year, at the present rate of pay in the course of the next year and a half seems to me preposterous.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Perhaps I can set the House straight in regard to the number of men we are short in the enlistments. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is mistaken. I was in Gen. McCain's office this morning, and I asked him how many he was short. He said he was short only from ten to twelve thousand of the required number that should be in the Army on June 30, and that the enlistments coming in so far this month exceeded any other time in the last year.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman has misunderstood

The Adjutant General.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think so. Mr. GARDNER. I think so, because— The CHAIRMAN. The time of the s

The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. What The Adjutant General probably said to the gentleman was that by June 30, 1917, he hoped and calculated that he would be short only about 11,000 men. The fact remains that at the present time he is 23,000 men short, but there are five months coming, and he thinks that if he can gain 2,000 a month that would make him short only about 11,000 by the end of June

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman go to the telephone and call him up and ask him whether I am wrong?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the discrepancy in figures arises from the fact that the gentleman has not taken into consideration that the department is authorized to carry 8,000 unassigned recruits, which are not given credit for in those figures.

Mr. GARDNER. I do give credit for them. I asked especially that question, perfectly aware of the fact that guards at disciplinary barracks, school detachments, disciplinary companies, recruit companies, and unassigned recruits are all extra. I asked especially what was the entire enlisted strength of the whole business, and the General replied on January 26 as fol-

The actual enlisted strength of the entire Regular Army on December 31, 1916, based on the best data now obtainable, is approximately 109,959, not including 5,549 enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts.

There is the figure. We have 109,959. I asked the General a series of questions. I asked him the authorized enlisted strength of the entire Regular Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. He replied:

The authorized enlisted strength of the entire Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, under the provisions of the national defense act is 183,166 men, not including the enlisted strength, 5,733, of the Philippine Scouts.

In both cases the Philippine Scouts, between 5,000 and 6,000, are excluded.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I have somewhat doubted the propriety of Members of Congress speaking on the foreign situation at this time. I should have refrained from doing so myself if it were not for the fact that speeches have been made on this floor during the past several days that I do not think are expressive of the dominant sentiment of the House. We have had one character of speech that seems to be in favor of doing nothing; another character of speech that seems to be in favor of doing everything. I think it would be wise, gentlemen, for Members of this body to take a moment and ascertain just what difficulty confronts this Nation. The appalling conflict on the other side of the sea was instituted without the volition of the United States. We did not start that war. We have no direct and immediate interest in the ultimate issue of that war. There is no belligerent engaged in the war across the water who has designs, so far as surface indications disclose, upon the United States of America. If international law has been violated to our injury, it has not been because the ultimate purpose of England or Germany or any other nation engaged was to injure this country. The injury suffered is merely incidental to the terrific struggle going on between the entente and the central powers. What is the real situation? We have certain rights on the sea to ship, unrestricted, to neutrals, and to ship to belligerents so far as the goods so shipped are not contraband. Those rights have been denied. I wish to say for my part that I am in favor of this Nation defending those rights, but we need not go to war to do so. If we become involved in war; if this body in response to a demand from any source were to pass a declaration of war, we will not accomplish what we desire, which is the freedom of the seas, but we will be adding the influence of our resources, both of life and property, to the accomplishment of what some of the belligerents desire.

If we become a party to this war, we will never get out until it is finished. I believe that the President will ask from Congress the right to enforce an armed neutrality. I believe he has such right without consulting us. There is ample precedent for such course. Twice in the history of the world armed neutrality has been enforced, first, during our revolutionary period in 1780 and again in 1800, and from the action of neutral nations sternly demanding their rights to the sea came the provisions of international law which recognize the right of neutrals to the ocean. None of the nations enforcing those rights became involved in war. I am in favor of either arming our merchantmen or convoying them with our Navy, if need be, to defend the rights which are now denied, and when those rights are obtained I want the United States to be in a position to withdraw. [Applause.] Suppose, on the other hand, we go to war. Suppose we send the youth of America to the blood-drenched fields of Europe to be obedient to the command of a king or a czar, to be the comrade in arms of savages and Hindus, to lay down their lives for a principle which concerns some country not their own. Suppose we send the youth of America to lie stark with white upturned faces upon a foreign battle field, what have we accomplished? Nothing; nothing but to crush the civilization of the world. Gentlemen of this House, in this solemn hour I declare that I will go from this Chamber forever and glory in my going before by my voice or my vote the United States shall unnecessarily become involved in war. [Applause.] The loss of life, the loss of property are comparatively trivial in their consequences. It is the sacrifice of ideals that have controlled America for 150 years. It is the giving up of our exclusive rights to the civilization of this hemisphere; it is becoming a party to the intrigues of Europe; it is sitting about a peace table not only with England, Germany, and France, but with Russia and Japan as well, rearranging the boundary lines of Europe, fixing indemnities, and irretrievably and eternally becoming a party to European affairs. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] stated that the eventualities as enumerated in the address of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] were impossible. There is no man of judgment with the courage to predict where our entrance into this war would carry us. Even as I talk to you in the waning hours of this afternoon, far on the other side of this troubled world the night winds are kissing the folds of Old Glory that was raised over the lonely island in that far away sea as an eventuality-of the Spanish-American War, a result that God alone foresaw when the war began. How far we shall go, how far it will take us, no one man can say, and for that reason I favor the cooperation of the United States to the extent of protecting our rights and no further. [Applause.] When that interest is served we may withdraw, not as a belligerent but as a great nation speaking for the neutrals of the world and protecting a common right to the free access and the free use of the highways of nations, the seas. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, the address of the gentleman from Nebraska is truly inspiring. [Applause.] It is filled with fruitful thoughts, and I am obliged to him for

I, too, insist that we should assert American rights upon the high seas, and especially in our dealings with neutral countries. I have supported measures in this House, every one of them, I believe, to prepare this country to assert its rights upon the high seas, but I want the rights of the United States upon the high seas asserted against every nation that interferes with or tramples upon those rights. [Applause,]

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman did not gather from my remarks that I do not approve of that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I approve in the main of everything the gentleman said and congratulate him upon what he did say

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But for a question.

Mr. GARRETT. Then I will not interrupt now. Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have in my hand a letter just received, which I shall proceed immediately to read:

AMERICAN TRANSATIANTIC CO., 17 Battery Place, New York, February 13, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: Apropos your remarks to the House of Representatives on last Friday condemning the British efforts to embroil our country in war by circulating false reports, we are calling to your attention the illegal actions of the British Government against our property, indicating another instance of its unworthy object to sacrifice American interests to gain its selfish ends.

Of course, I am not the author of this statement. I am reading a letter:

Ing a letter:

The American Transatlantic Co. is an American corporation, with every officer, director, and stockholder a citizen of the United States, and owning 11 steamers, which were purchased free of all encumbrance from neutral nations, while under neutral flags. There is no foreign interest, direct or indirect, in this company or its ships.

Over a year ago the British Government blacklisted and selzed three of our ships while in transit between the United States and South America, carrying coal for American firms. The reason given for the selzures was that citizens of enemy countries were interested in our company. This belief resulted solely from statements of the United States Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, which were based solely on unfounded suspicions.

Our ships were rightfully flying the American flag at the time of seizure, and the Department of State has held and sent notes to England stating that the seizures were illegal and that the ships ought to be released, though it declined to say that the ships must be released, giving as a reason that such a demand would mean war with Great Britain.

Contrary to law, the English Government, after seizing the ships, requisitioned them for their own use, and have been using them for Britain.

Contrary to law, the English Government, after seizing the ships, requisitioned them for their own use, and have been using them for over a year without any compensation to us. The three ships represent a market value of $8,000,000 and the loss of earnings and cost to us represent a like amount. The British claim that the ships are being held for prize-court proceedings. These proceedings have been postponed time and again, and there is no indication that the case will come to trial before the close of the war.

We are giving you this information that you may know of a specific case showing the disposition of the British Government to further its own interests in any way, regardless of international law or the rights and security of American citizens.

Very truly, yours,

R. G. Wagner, President.

That, it seems to me, is an important statement affecting American rights. I ask some international lawyer in the House who interprets the phrase "the freedom of the seas" whether the United States ships thus involved are entitled to the freedom of the seas? [Applause.] Let them answer in their own time.

I hold in my hand another letter which I hope I may have time to read. It involves American citizens seized upon the high seas and held in virtual captivity on the other side of the water. I have not time to go into details, but will read only the letter of the Secretary of State of the United States in answer to my request for information as to the status of these American citizens who were evidently denied "the freedom of the seas":

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 16, 1916.

Hon. J. Hampton Moore, House of Representatives.

House of Representatives.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of June 1, 1916, relative to the claims of various American citizens against the British Government growing out of their detention at Falmouth, England, on August 4, 1914, as passengers on the steamships Prinz Adalbert and Kronprinzessin Cecilie, these claims having been presented to the department by Mr. Theodore Cuyler Patterson, of 2213 Delancey Street, Philadelphia.

In reply I have the honor to say that the department has informed Mr. Patterson on a number of occasions to the effect that it does not consider that it is in a position to press these claims at the present time, and it has pointed out to him that it must determine for itself the time and methods for acting in matters of this kind.

This letter is dated June 16, 1916, 20 months after these American citizens had been taken from the high seas by British officers.

can citizens had been taken from the high seas by British officers. The Secretary of State continues:

Respecting your inquiry as to whether the communication addressed by the department to Mr. Patterson under date of April 18, 1916, in which he was advised in the sense just indicated, should be interpreted to mean that "the department dismisses the claims referred to," and as to whether the department knows of any course these claimants may pursue to obtain redress for their grievances, it may be stated that in no communication addressed to Mr. Patterson has the department indicated any disinclination to give these claims proper consideration at the appropriate time.

Eight months have elapsed. I asked the department only recently for further information, but the situation is in statu quo. But as to the rights of Americans upon the high seas and our asserting those rights, read this additional paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more in which to read this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will read:

The claimants are, of course, at liberty to institute proceedings in the appropriate British tribunals with a view to obtaining indemnity for the injuries which they allege were suffered by them. In this connection the department may call attention to the principle of international law that a claimant against a foreign Government is not as a general rule entitled to the diplomatic intervention of his own Government until he has exhausted his legal remedies in the tribunals of the country against which he makes the claim. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

Robert Lansing.

ROBERT LANSING.

These American citizens, within their rights upon the high seas, but on a German ship, were not traveling for the mere purpose of a thrill to the war's agitation upon the other side, but their appeal to their own Government for the assertion of that freedom of the seas of which we boast is met in part by the suggestion, even in the midst of these trying times, that they go over yonder into the tribunals of Great Britain and assert their claims. Oh, ye international lawyers who are determining questions for us in this House, will you please tell me how these American citizens who were denied the right to the free seas by one great Government are to obtain redress?

That is not all. Here is a proposition even more serious as affecting the difficulties we seem bound to get into. I have a letter from an American citizen, one of many, who is endeavoring to do business upon the high seas which we think are free, but which seem now to be "bottled up" against every American ship sailing from an American port, whether it goes into a neutral country or whether it does not. [Applause.] This letter intimates that our boasted freedom of the seas to American shipping to-day means that a ship with American commerce or with the flag attached must first obtain the approval of at least one of the great nations before it can make its destination beyond the 3-mile line. The writer says:

beyond the 3-mile line. The writer says:

I wanted to call your attention to the humiliating position of the American importers of goods from Great Britain and her possessions. It would take a lengthy correspondence to give you the details.

So you will be able to form an idea as to what I am alluding, I inclose three blanks. For identification, I have marked them A, B, and C. Before referring to them I desire to call your attention to the conditions under which importers were allowed to import from Great Britain and her possessions. For a time permission was obtained through the British consul general in the principal ports of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia; then the Textile Alliance (Inc.), New York, acting in conjunction with Messrs. Freshfield, London, for account of the British Government, imposed new conditions, and we were compelled to sign various papers and pay tribute to the Textile Alliance of I per cent and one-fourth per cent to certain bankers through whom the documents had to be forwarded. Recently the commission paid to the Textile Alliance was reduced to one-half per cent, but the additional commission to the bankers of one-fourth per cent is still imposed.

I will not give the name of the American association for it

I will not give the name of the American association, for it might embarrass them in their desire to continue in the import-

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope that I will not use five minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded at the end of 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded at the end of 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will read:

Then application was made in writing, and if approved by them, essrs. Freshfield, or the British Foreign Office, was advised by cable

Then application was Messrs. Freshfield, or the British Foreign Office, was advised by called or mail.

Form A. This is a blank recently distributed to both the already approved and new applicants for permission. This virtually gives the representatives of the British Government the right to examine your books and accounts.

Form B. When properly filled out will give the British Government a complete record of the kind of goods you buy, and to whom you sell, whether it be in the United States or in neutral countries.

Form C. One is obliged to fill out this form in making application for permission to import goods from any one of the ports of Great Britain or her colonies, a separate application being necessary in the case of each shipper.

Can you imagine anything more humiliating than an importer of many years standing being obliged to sign such an agreement in order to keep his business, which has been established for many years, going until affairs become in a more normal condition? I claim that countries who are asking so many favors from us should not be permitted to impose on us such arbitrary restrictions if we want to import from their countries.

France is now also imposing restrictions on goods, shipments direct to the United States, but in some cases she is permitting goods to be forwarded to the United States provided they are shipped from her colonies through French or English merchants, the same to the detriment of the American merchants, who import from those places direct.

As you well know, it is very difficult, particularly in times like the present, to obtain positive information of the actions of other governments, whereby they are discriminating against the favored nation, as in the present, but the circumstantial evidence, up to the present, shows that both Great Britain and France are working together to absorb and control the trade of the United States, to the detriment of the American importers and exporters.

I will not read further from this letter.

It is well known to importers and to exporters that no business can be done by merchants in the United States without receiving the approval of the Textile Alliance, incorporated under Great Britain's auspices in New York and in Chicago. These are the conditions that confront American trade at this time. We talk of "the freedom of the seas" as if it were an actual fact. We discuss international law as if it were a real thing, and yet when we attempt to send our people abroad to travel where they please under protection of their American citizenship, we find that they may be taken from ships, with no redress except to go to their captors for justice, and that their commerce may be requisitioned by those who demand it.

We find that cargoes of coal going to pacific South America can be seized and taken into the port of a belligerent, and that the remedy pointed out to the owner of a vessel or of a cargo is to go into the court of the captor to obtain justice. And yet we say that we insist upon the freedom of the seas and that we will fight to maintain it,

Gentlemen of the Congress, we may punish Germany, and for such crimes as she may have committed against our country I trust she may be held accountable; but if we are to preserve our strength as an independent Nation and are to maintain our rights to sail upon the broad ocean as free as if we were traveling over our own country, then we should at least be just enough and neutral enough to maintain those rights against every nation that assails them, whether upon land or sea. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the RECORD with these remarks blanks that are apparently sanctioned by the British Embassy and which American merchants are expected to sign before they can obtain the approval of the Textile Alliance to permit American cargoes to go upon the high seas

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Harrison of Mississippi having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message sippi naving taken the chair as speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tully, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8348) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a juvenile court in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Pom-erene, Mr. Hollis, and Mr. Dillingham as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational educa-tion; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditures

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution without amendment:

House concurrent resolution 75.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (S. 703) entitled "An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure." the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the "name" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "designate or create," in the third line of the second paragraph of section 5 as the same appears in the conference report on said bill and amendment.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed by unanimous

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes, and ask not to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objec-

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I have been restraining myself for two weeks. I feel that I am now in complete self-control and that I can speak safely.

Let us go to the meat of the situation. A question was asked yesterday of the leader of the minority by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies]. The astute and brilliant leader of the minority, who is always ready to answer any question thrown at him, thought that the question was embarrassing, and declined to answer it. The thing that the gentleman from Illinois did not dare do I should hardly dare attempt, but as I am younger and can afford to be indiscreet, I shall answer that I contend that the question has already been answered by the American people. One of the belligerents has already denied the freedom of the seas to American commerce, and the great masses of the American people have refused to accept the idea of going to war because of that injury to American commerce. The practical and the concrete question to-day is this: Having refused to go to war with one of the belligerents because a part of our commerce has been driven off the seas, shall we go to war with the other belligerent because the rest of our commerce is being threatened? [Applause.] In other words, shall we fight for the privilege of carrying on commerce with the belligerent nations? That commerce, so far as exports are concerned, is confined principally to the business of supplying the belligerents with munitions.

Is there any doubt that the American people will repudiate the war agitation if the question is honestly presented?

I am not very generous to what we Socialists call the "capitalistic class," but I would readily vote hundreds of millions of dollars into the pockets of the munition traffickers rather than

The kings and rulers of the Old World have so managed it that every one of the belligerent nations in Europe to-day is fighting for something that appeals to sentiment, that appeals to the spiritual man. Poor little Serbia is fighting against extinctions. Austria-Hungary seeks national consolidation and an unobstructed road to the Orient. Germany is struggling against being crushed by powerful enemies that surround her on all Russia, the giant of the East-a giant without lungs, because it has not a warm-water port-seeks a warm-water port, and says that she has entered the combat to help a weaker Slav brother, Serbia. If Italy gets what she has started out for, she will restore to herself her "Italia Irridente," that portion of northern Italy now possessed by Austria. Roumania will get back some of her territory. Every one of those nations, if it wins the war, will have satisfied some national aspiration, some national ideal. Of course the probabilities are that none of them will have anything to show commensurate with the sacrifices made. What national ideal will the United States satisfy by a war? What will the United States have accomplished if it goes to war and wins? It will have acceptable of the company of the c plished if it goes to war and wins? It will have established the right of munition makers to sell munitions. That is the only thing that will be established. It will be a war for cash, a war for commerce. It will be a war for the right of the powder barrel, with the American flag on the barrel, giving it the sanctity of the flag and everything that the flag represents.

Why not face the issue fairly and honestly? And if you face that issue fairly and honestly, there can be only one answer such a war is inconceivable.

There seems to be a great deal of soberness and sanity in this Congress now-a great deal more soberness and sanity than I expected to find, I will say. I hope that will not be stricken from the Record. [Laughter and applause.] It is a safe policy to attack people collectively and not individually, because every one takes it as intended for somebody else and is not offended.

It is self-evident that the United States would have exercised a tremendous influence if, in the council of nations, it would act the part of the arbitrator. It would then be the one great neutral power, the one great Republic, the repository of the ideals of democracy and liberty. But the United States as an ally, the United States as a participant in the war, as a sharer in its spoils, will play only such part as will be justified by her contributions to the final result. When you are in the council of nations after the settlement of a war you are strong only to the extent to which you can lick all your partners. It is only when you can say to them, "These are the terms which you shall accept. If you do not accept them, I will lick you all. Take the course I suggest or I am going to fight you all," that you will count. The average American may believe that he can lick the whole world, but he can not. It is not by licking anybody that America has become what she is to-day. We have made progress because we have developed as a peaceful Nation, engaged in peaceful pursuits, promoting democracy, and to me America is so dear not only for the things that she has accomplished but for the great promise for the future that America holds out to the world. [Applause.] I do not hesitate to declare my faith and my hope in the greatness and glory of America as long as she pursues her ideals. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I hope we will not be swept off our feet. I have a great admiration for the President of the United States, but I fear that slogan, "Stand by the President." It is a dangerous battle cry when the people cease to be a people and become a mob. "Stand by the President" means a great deal when the President is right. "Stand by the President" is a dangerous slogan when the President is in error. It is a mighty dangerous thing to permit Congress to drift into a state of mind where one man can sweep you off your feet. I call for the greatest exercise of freedom of thought, of speech, and of discussion, and the most earnest application to the problem which confronts us. I am glad that the Congress of the United States is seriously discussing this problem and that we are preparing ourselves to act as sensible men should act in a great crisis. When the framers of the Constitution vested Congress with the power to declare war they did not intend that Congress should in a perfunctory way go through the ceremony of declaring war upon somebody's suggestion. The right to declare war means the right to refuse to declare war. It involves deliberation, study, analysis, the searching of one's conscience, the calling into action of all our mental powers. And if there ever was a time when every Member of Congress should be free and strong and independent, this is the time. [Applause.]

I hope, gentlemen, that we shall be spared the horrors of the conflict. I hope that we will stand by our fundamental principles, Germany is now threatening a portion of our commerce. Germany has violated fundamental principles, not only of international law but of that law which is more sacred than all the textbooks that have ever been compiled by quibbling lawyers. When Germany invaded Belgium, when Germany proceeded to deport the civilian population of Belgium, when Germany sunk the helpless women and children on the Lusitania, she committed a crime against civilization, against humanity. We did not fight then, but now when business is injured people talk of the possibility of war.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. LONDON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it the gentleman's understanding that the President severed diplomatic relations with Germany because of commercial reasons?

Mr. LONDON. We are confronted now with an accomplished fact. I opposed the severance of diplomatic relations during the discussion of the McLemore resolution. I do not want to criticize the President for what he has already done. He has severed diplomatic relations with Germany. He has not severed diplomatic relations with England for various violations of neutral rights.

How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Then I can answer the question. I do not forget the fundamental difference between the German situation and the British situation. I like to face facts squarely and speak honestly; if a man can not afford to speak honestly there is no use talking at all, and if a Socialist should not be honest, who would be? [Laughter.] England has accomplished her blockade, and England has deprived the United States and other neutral powers of the freedom of the seas by what has heretofore been recognized more or less as a civilized method of doing things. Germany is striving to obtain the same result by means of the submarine, which threatens human life. That is the fundamental distinction, and it is because of this fundamental distinction that the President said to Germany, "We can not do business with you. You disregard fundamental rights of humanity. You throw away human life ruthlessly, cruelly, without compunction. We can not do any business with you." Whether he was wise or not is immaterial. So far as the great masses of the American people are concerned, so far as the question of war or peace is involved, the question reduces itself to this, Shall we submit to the blockade of England? Shall we not submit to the blockade instituted by Germany? The question of method affects only a small number of individuals. The method pursued by Germany threatens a small number of individuals who engage in that traffic and who find themselves within the war zone. So far as the right to the freedom of the seas is concerned, both belligerents disregard our rights. Is not that so?

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the gentleman make a distinction-understand, now, I am taking no part in it, but I want to

Mr. LONDON. You have a right to take a part, and ought not to be afraid to take a part.

Mr. CALDWELL. The point I want to get is, Does the gentleman make any distinction between the violation of an international right where human life is involved, and where only property is involved?

Mr. LONDON. Why, of course I draw that distinction. I said so. I started out with that; but so far as the great masses of the American people are concerned it is purely a question to what extent their commerce will be injured.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman mean to maintain that if an American ship is sunk now with Americans on board and American lives are lost by the action of Germany to maintain her blockade, that that presents the same sort of a situation to this country as when England seized our ships on the sea without the loss of human life?

Mr. LONDON. No; it presents a more difficult problem.

There is no doubt about that. But do not forget, please, that those lives will be lost after warning has been given not to enter the war zone. If American lives are lost when you get within the range of the guns fired from the walls of a belligerent fortress, you have no complaint. That is what it amounts to. Germany has now surrounded the British Isles by guns which have a longer range than the guns she had before. That is the proceeding proposition. practical proposition. If you are not within the war zone, your life is not in danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

United States service schools: To provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Army service schools (including the Army Staff College, the Army School of the Line, the Army Field Engineer School, the Army Field Service and Correspondence School for Medical Officers, and the Army Signal School) at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., the Mounted Service School, at Fort Kiley, Kans., and the School of Fire for Field Artillery and for the School of Musketry, at Fort Sill, Okla., by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, the purchase of modern instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction, employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and for all other absolutely necessary expenses, to be allotted in such proportion as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be for the best interests of the military service. Not exceeding $100 per month may be used for the payment of one translator, to be appointed by the commandant of the Army service schools with the approval of the Secretary of War, $35,350: Provided, That officers in the grade of second licutenant in the Field Artillery may be assigned, for the period of one year, to batteries stationed at the School of Fire for Field Artillery at Fort Sill, Okla., for the purpose of pursuing courses of practical instruction in field artillery.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word and asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if there are any other gentlemen who want time on this

Mr. PLATT. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. I want a little time. Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that after 30 minutes all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be concluded. I want to say that I think I have been pretty liberal and fair with the committee on this proposition, and I hope that after this we will go on and read the items in

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman's request include a desire that the Chair shall recognize the gentlemen who have asked for time?

Mr. DENT. It does.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto terminate in 30 minutes, the Chair to recognize certain gentlemen in the division of the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, for once we seem to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. London] in absolute accord; for, as I gather from their arguments, they take the position that if Congress shall be called upon to take any action in this present international crisis, that because the executive branch of this Government has failed to maintain our rights against England with reference to property rights, we should refuse to vote to maintain our rights against Germany involving human life.

Mr. Chairman, Congress can not excuse itself from the performance of its duty, if called upon, by pointing to the derelic-tion, if there be dereliction, of the executive branch of this Government in another case. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the present crisis with Germany I have felt that the best service a Member of Congress could render his country was to refrain from discussing the matter on the floor until we were called upon to take some action. Unfortunately that has not been done, and extremists on both sides have been freely expressing their opinions until there is a very general belief throughout the country that if Congress is called upon to act at all it will choose between a general declaration of war against Germany, intervening in the European war, and a position that, whatever the provocation may be, we will under no circumstances defend our rights with force.

Believing, as I do, that neither of these positions correctly interprets the position of Congress, the President, or the American people, I think it proper now to give expression to what I believe is the dominant sentiment of the House at this time. I have no authority to speak for anyone but myself, but in conversation with my colleagues I find a very general sentiment in agreement with my own views.

In severing diplomatic relations with Germany the President did only his duty. Applause.] To have done less would have forfeited any respect the world still had left for us. [Applause.]

By her own admission Germany has made herself an outlaw. She does not pretend that her act which was the cause of the breach can be justified by international law. She asserts that she will sink without warning neutral ships and destroy neutral lives within goodfad around the state of the cause of the ca lives within specified zones. In the case of other neutrals she has actually done so. Any day may bring the news of destruction of American ships and American lives in admitted violation of international law and of the laws of humanity.

If I understand the views expressed by some gentlemen, if this shall come to pass, we must do nothing; that no matter what the provocation may be, under no circumstances must we defend our rights with force. If this is to be the attitude of Congress and the American people, then the days of this Republic are numbered. [Applause.] We will no longer be a Nation, for any people too cowardly to fight for their liberty upon the sea, if need be, will be too cowardly to fight for their liberty upon the land. But, Mr. Chairman, that is not the spirit of the American people, and when the time comes that will not be the spirit of this Congress. Representing the great American people here, we will vote to maintain by force, if need be, our liberties upon the sea: but that does not mean that we will vote a general declaration of war against Germany; it does not mean that we will intervene in the European war; it does not mean that we will send our men to the trenches of Europe; it does not mean that we are to sit in and determine the terms of settlement of European questions. It means only that we are going to settle our difficulty with Germany by compelling her to respect our rights upon the sea. [Applause.] If war must come, it will be a war upon the sea, destroying every German submarine that we can and protecting our own ships until such time as Germany shall cease to be an outlaw upon the sea. When Germany shall again respect our rights our quarrel with her will be over and we will be ready to make peace with her regardless of European nations or European quarrels. [Applause.]

I believe the American people and this Congress will stand for this policy, and that those who would drag us into this world war for reasons other than maintaining our own rights, and those who are for peace at any price, together, constitute a very small minority.

Mr. Chairman, when the contest upon the McLemore resolution arose last year I was against the President, because I believed he was wrong, because I was unwilling to commit myself to the use of force to maintain what the President had himself denominated a doubtful legal right. I never will vote to use force to maintain a doubtful legal right; but there is no doubt about the questions involved in this crisis. They are admitted wrongs, and the only question is whether we shall submit to them without any further effort to correct them.

If we are called upon to act in this matter, it will be the most solemn responsibility ever laid or to be laid upon any of us. If any Member in that hour is influenced in the least degree by party politics, by prejudice, by sympathy for either side in the European war, he will be untrue to the oath of office he has taken here. If ever in our lives we should be American citizens taken here.

only, it will be then.

I am not so greatly alarmed about possible trouble with Germany as I am about a divided country tere. Divisions now may not only prevent a peaceful settlement of our quarrel with Germany but may result in disorder within our own borders, with consequences much more serious than war with any for-

The propaganda now going on throughout the country to avoid war at any cost is a greater peril to the Republic than war with Germany would be. [Applause.] The proposition for a war referendum is likewise a great peril. Suppose at this time a referendum was held; suppose 10.000,000 votes were cast, 5,100,000 for war and 4,900,000 against. If war was declared on that vote, does it require a prophet to foresee possible civil war among ourselves? Or suppose 4,900,000 voted for war and 5,100,000 against, and we refuse then to exercise force to maintain our rights, how long would it be before we would have no place upon the seas anywhere-England with impunity shutting us out when to her advantage, and Germany doing likewise when to her profit?

We each have duties and responsibilities here which we can delegate to no one, chief among which is to do that which will best preserve those liberties which the fathers of the Republic gained for us, and preserve this Union which we have each worn to support. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, every time throughout the European war that the House of Representatives has officially or by útterance of its membership thrust itself into the problems of the war it has, in my opinion, brought this country nearer to the danger zone. I myself have never discussed the issues of the war or anything pertaining to the European war save upon one occasion, when official duty rendered it necessary-the Mc-Lemore resolution being called up for action.

I violate no confidence when I say to this House that the hours just before the action on the McLemore resolution were the darkest hours which the diplomatic branch of this Government has passed through since the present European war began.

I do not rise in any spirit of criticism of gentlemen who have seen fit to so extensively discuss this matter, although I can not but feel that these expressions, or many of them, have been extremely unwise and have been detrimental, not with any bad intention on the part of the utterers, of course, to the best interests of the peace of this country. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I shall in this hour, when the House is calm, recall to the membership here the official utterance of the President of the United States. suggestions so well and so pertinently made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] a while ago are in line with this official utterance. Such speeches as that made by the gentleman from Nebraska are not subject to the criticism that they injure the peace of the country.

I think it is well to read this now, because I think there are many Members of this House even who have lost sight of what the real issue is and what the President really said. It is perhaps not remarkable that much of the press of the country appears to have lost sight of it. It is not at all strange that the multiplied thousands of private citizens in the country have lost sight of it, but surely it is inexcusable that Members of this body, likely at any time to have the responsibility thrust upon them to act, should lose sight of the issue and drag into the discussion extraneous matter—that is, matter extraneous to the one purpose expressed before us by the Chief Executive of the Government. I shall not undertake to interpret the language; it would not be proper and it is not necessary, because the language interprets itself. I read from the address of the President delivered at a joint session of the Senate and House on February 3:

House on February 3:

Notwithstanding this unexpected action of the German Government, this sudden and deeply deplorable renunciation of its assurances, given this Government at one of the most critical moments of tension in the relations of the two Governments, I refuse to believe that it is the intention of the German authorities to do in fact what they have warned us they will feel at liberty to do. I can not bring myself to believe that they will indeed pay no regard to the ancient friendship between their people and our own or to the solemn obligations which have been exchanged between them and destroy American ships and take the lives of American citizens in the willful prosecution of the ruthless naval program they have announced their intention to adopt. Only actual overt acts on their part can make me believe it even now.

If this inveterate confidence on my part in the sobrlety and prudent foresight of their purpose should unhapply prove unfounded; if American ships and American lives should in fact be sacrificed by their naval commanders in heedless contravention of the just and reasonable understandings of international law and the obvious dictates of humanity, I shall take the liberty of coming again before the Congress, to ask that authority be given me to use any means that may be necessary for the protection of our seamen and our people in the prosecution of their peaceful and legitimate errands on the high seas. I can do nothing less.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the time has been limited by unanimous consent. I do not want to ask for any more myself, but I will appreciate it if some gentleman who is to be recognized will be good enough to grant me two minutes of his time.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I will grant the gentleman two minutes of my time.

Mr. GARRETT. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I have read this simply to show the full extent to which the President has gone. No utterance of the President has suggested war except as it might follow incidentally. What the President has said he and his administration are entitled to be measured by. Public sentiment must be and ought to be consulted, but that sentiment should be formed from an exact knowledge of the issue presented.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Does the gentleman object to free exchange of Mr. LONDON. opinion upon the subject so as to reach a clear understanding of

Mr. GARRETT. I do not like to say that I do, but I will say that in my opinion if the McLemore resolution had passed the House of Representatives, or after it had reached a certain stage, if it had not been called up and laid on the table this country would have been at war months and months ago, and my further impression is that there is nothing which will so unerringly and certainly lead toward the preservation of peaceful relations between this country and Germany at the present time under the great tension which exists as will a refraining on the part of gentlemen here in the war-declaring body from intemperate utterances upon this question. [Applause.]
Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. The gentleman presents a serious question to me. Is it not a fact that our Government warned our people out of the war zone in Mexico, regardless of our rights to

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not try to carry me into that discussion. That is a case which stood upon its own bottom. We are dealing now with a situation more tense than any with which the present membership of this House has ever been called upon to deal, and there rests upon us, and I feel it, the gravest responsibility of our lives. I am extremely anxious that we shall be duly circumspect in the matter. [Ap-

Mr. PLATT rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DECKER). Was the gentleman from New York one of those to be recognized under the unanimousconsent agreement?

Mr. PLATT.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Was not the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be recognized?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes. Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee was to have 10 minutes under the arrangement.

Mr. FOCHT. I want only five minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. I want only live limites.

Mr. MANN. It will be easy enough to correct it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I agree in general with what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenkoot] so well said as to what we could do to fully protect our rights on the high seas without going further into the European war than necessary to protect those rights. I have introduced into the House three bills to carry out just exactly what the gentleman from Wisconsin advocated, and those three bills were once laws of the United States. They were laws that were passed by the Fifth Congress, in the spring and summer of 1798, at a time when the United States of America had a population of only 5,000,000 people. The controversy at that time was almost identically the same as the present controversy. There were no submarines in those days, to be sure, in 1798, but war vessels used to sneak up on merchant vessels under cover of neutral flags and fire upon them, which amounts to practically the same thing as an attack without warning. They sought to capture them rather than to sink them, it is true, and they took on board the crews of the captured vessels, so the practice of those days was by no means so inhuman as the German submarine practice of to-day. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting these three short bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if gentlemen have looked into just what was done by the United States in 1798. England and France were at war with each other. Both nations were interfering with the rights of neutrals on the seas as at present, but the French were doing the most damage at that time, and antagonism was aroused chiefly against France, so that our action was taken against France and not against England. One of these laws authorized American merchantmen to arm for defense. Another one shut off all commercial intercourse with France and provided that no ship leaving the United States under any circumstances should go directly or indirectly to France or to any French dependency or trade with anyone resident in France. I have taken that law and copied it almost word for word, substituting the word "Germany" for the word "France." If passed now, it will shut off all commercial inter-"France." If passed now, it will shut off all commercial inter-course with Germany and will prevent any further disputes with England.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Not at present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Right on that point-

Mr. PLATT. The third law authorized war vessels of America to go out upon the high seas and capture French war vessels or armed vessels wherever found, and substituting the word "German" for the word "French" this bill would give our Navy absolute right to-day to go out and capture or sink German submarines or cruisers wherever they may be found. That is what we did in 1798, when we were a little nation of 5,000,000 people, and surely we can not be afraid to do the same thing to protect our rights now when we are a nation of 100,000,000 people. If we are, are not we justly subject to the charge of cowardice? How can anybody hold otherwise? In these bills I have left out obsolete matter, such as the authorization of privateers, which is, of course, no longer allowed, and a few other things of that sort, but, generally speaking, the bills are word for word as passed by the Fifth Congress in 1798 with the word "France" stricken out and the word "Germany" put in its place.

We could do to-day just exactly what we did then. We did t declare war against France. We did not even formally not declare war against France. break off diplomatic relations with France. We had no minister in France at that time it is true, and there was no French minister here, but there was no formal rupture of diplomatic relations. We were nominally neutral, although we went on the high seas and captured or sunk 84 armed French vessels and had two or three fights between frigates, the battleships of that day, that are famous in the annals of the American Navy, notably the fight between the Constellation and the Insurgente, which we captured.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I had 10 minutes,
The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DECKER). The Chair will say to the gentleman there is a mistake in regard to the allotment of time. The gentleman's name is not here, and the present occupant of the chair took the liberty of recognizing him.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Platt] was allowed 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes more.

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the gentleman was referring to the second bill that he had introduced he said it provided for a cessation of commercial intercourse with Germany, and I want to inquire whether our people have any commercial intercourse with Germany, or have had for two years past?

Mr. PLATT. I think there is still a certain amount of trade with Germany, directly or indirectly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it in the air or in fact?

Mr. PLATT. It is water-borne commerce through neutral countries. It has not been entirely shut off. Right in that connection I want to refer to the letters read a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore], letters protesting the shutting off of American commerce going to Germany. He read particularly a statement that Mr. Secretary Lansing had said that the State Department could not act until remedies before the courts in Great Britain had been first tried. I wonder if the gentleman knows that in our own Civil War we did exactly what England is doing now, or almost exactly. We picked up the British ship Peterhof off the island of St. Thomas, 1,000 miles away, going to the city of Matamoras, Mexico, a neutral port, and we sent her under a prize crew to New York, and the lower court, the district court, condemned the vessel as a prize, although it was an English vessel, a neutral vessel, going from one neutral port to another neutral port. The Peterhof was condemned as a prize by the lower court of New York. We also picked up the ship Springbok, going from one English port to another English port-Nassau, Bahama Islands. We sent that ship under a prize crew to New York, and the lower court condemned it as a prize on the theory that the goods in it were destined to the Southern Confederacy. Now, then, we have heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess] talk about what the Supreme Court decisions were in both of those cases. The owners of this vessel appealed to the British foreign office, just exactly as the case the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] referred to, and asked the foreign office to make violent protest to the American Government, but Lord Russell, the English foreign secretary, said to the owners of those vessels, "You have got to try your remedies in the courts of the United States first." There was then an appeal to the Supreme Court, and in both of those cases the Supreme Court overruled the decision of the lower court and the vessels were set free. But when? There is the crux of the whole situation, as far as our case with England goes. These vessels were captured in February, 1863, and they were set free in 1866, a year after the war was over.

Now, that is what England is doing. She is not going as far as we did. She is not condemning these vessels, as a rule, that are captured at sea, but she is simply taking them into port and paying for the cargoes, perhaps not the price the people expected to get, but at fair prices. The shippers are taking money from the English and have not much of a case left. There have been some condemnations, I believe, of goods consigned directly to German ports, and there are many cases pending in British courts. We undoubtedly are entitled to damages, I think, in many of these cases, but England's acts in enforcing her blockade form no justification for the destruction of ships and of human life by the German submarines.

Mr. Chairman, in introducing the bills which would give the President authority to put a stop to the illegal and inhuman German submarine operations without declaring war, I do not mean to imply that I shall not support him if he shall decide to go further. I shall support with my whole energy any adequate measures which the President may recommend for ending the present intolerable situation. The bills referred to are as as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20939) to suspend commercial intercourse between the United States and the German Empire.

Be it enacted, etc., That no ship or vessel owned, hired, or employed wholly or in part by any person resident within the United States shall hereafter be allowed to proceed directly or from any intermediate port or place to any port or place within the territory of the German Empire or the dependencies thereof, or shall be employed in any traffic or commerce with, or for any person resident within the jurisdiction, or under the authority of the German Empire. And if any ship or vessel in any voyage hereafter commencing, and before her return within the United States, shall be voluntarily carried, or suffered to proceed, to any German port or place as aforesald, contrary to the intent hereof, every ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be forfeited and shall accrue to the United States and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any circuit or district court of the United States.

Sec. 2. That hereafter no clearance for a foreign voyage shall be granted to any ship or vessel owned, hired, or employed wholly or in part by any person resident within the United States, until a be shall be given to the use of the United States, wherein the owner or employer, if usually resident or present, where the clearance shall be required, and otherwise his agent or factor, and the master or captain of such vessel for the intended voyage shall be parties, in a sum equal to the value of the ship or vessel and her cargo, with condition that the same shall not, during her intended voyage, or before her return within the United States, proceed or be carried, directly or indirectly, to any port or place within the territory of the German Empire or the dependencies thereof, unless by distress of weather, or by actual force or such bond; and that such vessel is not, and shall not be employed during her intended voyage, or before her return, as aforesaid, in any traffic or commerce direct or indirect, with or for any person resident within the territory of the empire above mentioned or any of its dependencies.

Sec. 3. That from and after due notice of the passing of this act, no German ship or vessel, armed or unarmed, commissioned by or for, or under the authority of the German Empire, or owned, fitted, hired or employed by any persons resident within the territory of the German Empire, or any of its dependencies, or sailing or coming therefrom, shall be

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels which are or which shall be employed in the service of the United States to subdue, seize, or take any armed German vessel which shall be found within the jurisdiction limits of the United States, or elsewhere, on the high seas; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being German property, shall be brought within some port of the United States and shall be duly proceeded against and condemned as forfeited, and shall accrue and be distributed as by law is or shall be provided respecting the captures which shall be made by the public armed vessels of the United States.

A bill (H. R. 20940) to authorize the defense of the merchant vessels of the United States against German depredations.

Be it enacted, etc., That the commander and crew of any merchant vessel of the United States, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens thereof may oppose and defend against any search, restraint, or seizure which shall be attempted upon such vessel, or upon any other vessel, owned, as aforesaid, by the commander or crew of any armed vessel sailing under German colors, or acting, or pretending to act, by, or under the authority of the German Empire; and may repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed or threatened on the part of such German, or pretended German, vessel pursuing such attempt, and may subdue and capture the same; and may also retake any vessel owned, as aforesaid, which may have been captured by any vessel sailing under German colors, or acting, or pretending to act, by, or under authority from the German Empire.

SEC. 2. That after notice of this act at the several customhouses no armed merchant vessel of the United States shall receive a clearance or permit, or shall be suffered to depart therefrom, unless the owner or owners and the master or commander of such vessel for the intended voyage shall give bond, to the use of the United States in, a sum equal to double the value of such vessel, with condition that such vessel shall not make or commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or unprovoked violence upon the high seas against the vessel of any nation in amity with the United States; and that the guns, arms, and ammunition of such vessel shall be returned within the United States or otherwise accounted for, and shall not be sold or disposed of in any foreign port or place; and that such owner or owners and the commander and crew of such merchant vessel shall in all things observe and perform such further instructions in the premises as the President of the United States shall establish and order for the better government of the armed merch

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish and order suitable instructions to, and for, the armed merchant vessels of the United States, for the better governing and restraining the commanders and crews who shall be employed therein, and to prevent any outrage, cruelty, or injury which they may be disposed to commit, a copy of which instructions shall be delivered by the collector of the customs to the commander of such vessel, when he shall give bond, as aforesald. And it shall be the duty of the owner or owners and commander and crew, for the time being, of such armed merchant vessel of the United States, at each return to any port of the United States, to make report to the collector thereof of any rencounter which shall have happened with any foreign vessel, and of the state of the company and crew of any vessel which they shall have subdued or captured; and the persons of such crew or company shall be delivered to the care of such collector, who, with the aid of the marshal of the same district, or the nearest military officer of the United States, or of the civil or military officers of any State, shall take suitable care for the restraint, preservation, and comfort of such persons at the expense of the United States until the pleasure of the President of the United States shall be known concerning them.

SEC. 4. That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of one year, and until the end of the next session of Congress thereafter: Provided, That whenever the Government of Germany, and all persons acting by or under their authority, shall disavow, and shall cause the commanders and crews of all armed German vessels to refrain from the lawless depredations and outrages hitherto encouraged and authorized by that Government against the merchant vessels of the United States, and he is hereby, authorized to instruct the commanders and crews of the merchant vessels of the United States to submit to any regular search by the commanders or crews

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask for how long a time I am recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes,

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I to a great extent agree with what has been said by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] with regard to dealing with this grave question. And yet since we are the war-making body, if there is to be war, we should have a clear, definite, comprehensive idea as to what the people of the country want, and we should know the views of each other. Therefore we must discuss this question, and discuss it freely, but fairly and dispassionately. I believe those wise forefathers who made the Constitution made it designedly to meet just such an exigency as this, and they meant that we should discuss this question of war, and of all things a war with a foreign power, and of all things again, my friends, certainly discuss this situation, since war, if it does come, will be as the ally of some dynasty of Europe and not wholly one of self-defense. Our sacred duty was clearly and lucidly set forth in the immortal speech delivered by George Washington in his Farewell Address, wherein warning against "entangling foreign alliances" constituted a large part of that mighty deliverance.

I have just 10 minutes in which to reply to some assertions that have been made on this floor, and many of them should not go unchallenged. I know it is pretty hard for any man who has been here listening to these speeches, many of them brilliant and comprehensive and delivered by really profound American statesmen, without forming some idea of what action ought to be taken or where one stands, or, in fact, becoming partial to one side or the other.

I am afraid that those excesses of speech which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett] referred to have been indulged in too freely on the floor of this House. I do not believe that personalities should be a part of the discussion of this great question. If any Members want to have a personal controversy, let them go outside. But just a while ago, during the debate of the question of the neutrality rights of this country and the manner in which our neutrality and the neutrality of other nations is treated by Great Britain, one of my dearest young friends of all my years of public life, who has made a worthy name in Pennsylvania, and to whom some day there will be erected a monument of sculptured marble, I am afraid labored under a misapprehension when he scoffed at the idea of the interference by England with American commerce with neutral nations.

I do not have time just now to pay much attention to what is said in the newspaper press, but I want to say to you here, my friends, in all fairness and candor, that my young friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] has been stricken hard in the newspaper press of this country simply because he has been courageous. He has been a newspaper man for 30 or 40 years, and he, as well as I, can appreciate and comprehend what newspapers might be capable of doing, carelessly or otherwise, because I myself have been in the business for 35 years. And without even attempting to cast any reproach or odium upon the position taken by any of these papers with regard to the neutrality rights of the United States, it is sufficient now to say that many important dailies have not been neutral, but boldly and blatantly proally.

My friends the assault that was made in the Washington Times and New York Sun against Mr. MANN and Mr. Moore of Pennsylvania to me sounded entirely too strenuous and as "protesting too much" for whoever wrote these articles to be beyond suspicion. And so it might be with the rest. I am now going to try to make this matter clear to my young friend from Pennsylvania, who might some day be governor, while we are waiting for the monument-that is, in case Mr. Moore of Pennsylvania in his championship of the freedom of speech in Congress, or McFadden, might not get there before you, Mr. Fare. I am not going abroad to hunt through any other Member's district and I am not taking the assertion made for or against this proposition in any newspaper. But it is a duty that I owe this House and the country, when I know of definite facts that exist of the wanton and willful interference with American commerce with neutral countries by Great Britain, to say so, and say it specifically, and give my facts and my figures on the question.

In the central part of Pennsylvania there is a great tanning industry on the Juaniata River, up at Mount Union, owned and operated by a gentleman named Calvin M. Greene and his two sons. He is a bright, energetic, honorable business man, and his two sons are graduates of a university. They, too, are fair and square men, and I believe are of German descent. Anyhow, they are business men and they are Americans, and I am their Congressman. They have written me this letter, and I want you to know what they say, and to judge whether there is any fake, or farce, or fraud about this talk of interference, or whether we have the freedom of the seas, in order that my young friend FARR may have full enlightenment, if not illumination. This is not of last June, as was the case cited by Mr. Moore of Pennsylvania. This was in December, and the letter

MOUNT UNION, December 18, 1916.

Hon. B. K. Focht, Lewisburg, Pa.

Dear B. K.: I inclose two notices from the trade department of the British Embassy, Washington, advising of cabling expenses necessary in order to find if the two parties named therein may have permission from the British Government to receive the goods which we want to Think of the outrage. An American manufacturer must come to Washington and get consent of the British Embassy to send goods into neutral ports. Is that freedom of the seas? Continuing, the letter reads:

It is very humiliating that American citizens must repeatedly ask Great Britain before any goods can be shipped to the neutral countries of Europe. Great Britain needs a good "beating up." Unfortunately, Germany has not had a square deal through the American press. We are no special descendants of Germany, but our opinion is that she is no worse than Great Britain.

With kindest regards and wishes for a happy Christmas,
Yours, very sincerely.

Mount Union Tanning & Extract Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

FOCHT. I would like to have two minutes in which to read this letter from the British Embassy. I think it is worthy of going into the RECORD.

Mr. DENT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman. Mr. FOCHT. Thank you very much. It says:

TRADE DEPARTMENT, BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, D. C., December 15, 1916.

MOUNT UNION TANNING & EXTRACT Co., Mount Union, Pa.:

(J. H. Goldschmidt, Copenhagen.)

The trade department of the British Embassy beg to advise you that the cabling expenses in connection with your application of the 12th instant amount to $3.95 and that it would be convenient if you would remit this sum at your earliest opportunity.

Here is another one:

TRADE DEPARTMENT, BRITISH EMBASSY, Washington, D. C., December 15, 1916.

MOUNT UNION TANNING & EXTRACT Co., Mount Union, Pa.:

(Norwegian Tanners' Association (notify John Jerndahl), Christiana; A. S. Bergens, Skofabrik, Bergen.)

The trade department of the British Embassy beg to advise you that the cabling expenses in connection with your application of the 12th instant amount to $6.65 and that it would be convenient if you would remit this sum at your earliest opportunity.

Under my leave to print, and in connection with the above, I beg to submit as part of my remarks the following editorial which I contributed to the Lewisburg (Pa.) Saturday News of February 17, 1917:

MARKING TIME.

The "overt" act on the part of Germany in the prosecution of her submarine warfare against England and her allies, which many are looking for as the signal to begin hostilities, has not yet been committed. It is the opinion of some, however, that inasmuch as many American ships traverse the prohibited zone something is likely to happen soon, by design or accident, that will precipitate at least some degree of armed conflict.

But since relations with Germany have been broken off there has been a disposition in Washington to "keep cool" and by all honorable means avert war. The President is saying nothing, but in the light of his manner of handling the Mexican situation he is not going to get his page in history as a war President. According to written expressions received in great volume by Members of Congress sentiment against a declaration of war or of engaging in war, excepting in an extreme exigency, is fast crystallizing among the American people.

The feeling is growing that while England has outraged our commerce and Germany criminally violated international law in sinking the Lusitania, the warring nations are in no sense hostile to us, and that whatever has been committed against us has not been through any hostile spirit. It is becoming more clearly realized every day that the European nations are in a death grapple, fighting for their very existence, and that any of them are liable to occasionally violate the rules. Hence a week has brought about a very much modified opinion as to the likelihood of war, and just what Congress should regard as sufficient justification for any action that will involve us in the horrors that infest the war trenches of Europe which have shocked the world. There is no division of opinion with reference to ample preparedness, which is proceeding as fast as the genius of American enterprise will permit. But the question Congress may be compelled to confront almost any day is whether or not before the adjournment March 5, and before an "overt" act is committed

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingencies, headquarters of military departments, districts, and tactical commands: For contingent expenses at the headquarters of the several territorial departments, territorial districts, tactical divisions and brigades, including the staff corps serving thereat, being for the purchase of the necessary articles of office, tollet, and desk furniture, stationery, ice, and potable water for office use when necessary, binding, maps, technical books of reference, professional and technical newspapers and periodicals, payment for which may be made in advance, and police utensils to be allotted by the Secretary of War, and to be expended in the discretion of the commanding officers of the several military departments, districts, and tactical commands, $7,500.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have listened here for some time and have been watching the reports made by several generals, admirals, and other military experts of the United States with reference to the possibility of getting recruits in our Army and Navy, and no one can deny that every statement that has been made as to the possibility of getting recruits has been challenged and found wanting. There has been no plan offered that would bring the young men of this country into either the Army or the Navy now or at any time when you need them unless it should be in stress of actual war.

It was suggested here by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard] this morning—and there was some applause following his statement—that you might do something in the way of educating young men in the Army and Navy and in that way attract them. Mr. Chairman, on the 10th of January, 1916, I introduced into the House joint resolution 93, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 93) authorizing the appointment of a com-mission in relation to educational, vocational, and military-naval training.

training.

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission be constituted to be known as the joint commission on educational, vocational, and military-naval training, to be composed of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker. The said joint commission be, and is hereby, directed, authorized, and empowered to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the following, to wit:

The need of educational, vocational, and military-naval training in the United States.

Whether national grants should be made to the various States to stimulate vocational and military-naval training, or whether schools or colleges should be established under the direct control of the United States and maintained entirely as national institutions.

If the said commission shall recommend that schools or colleges shall be established and maintained by the United States, then to recommend where not less than 20 such schools or colleges should be placed.

Whether a proportion of such schools should be established on the coasts for educational, vocational, and naval training exclusively. To make recommendations as to the course of instruction in agricultural, trade, and industrial subjects as well as in military and naval training to be given in such schools and colleges, and to recommend the minimum age at which boys shall be admitted to such schools or colleges and the method of selecting the said pupils.

To make recommendations as to the total number of pupils to be received annually and to estimate the annual cost of the maintenance of such schools and colleges.

To make recommendations as to whether pupils who have been trained in such schools or colleges shall be subject to the call of the United States for military or naval services, as the case may be, and the number of years during which this condition of service shall prevail, and whether such pupils shall during such period, when they are so subject to call for service, serve a limited time each year to perfect their military or naval training.

To make all other recommendations pertaining to the subject matter which aid in rendering more efficient a system under the control of the United States Government for educating boys while at the same time preparing them for military or naval service. To report as to whether any monetary compensation shall be given the said pupils in the event of their being called for annual training after graduating from the said school or college.

The said commission shall report their finding to Congress on or before October 1, 1916, together with a bill embodying their recommendations and establishing such educational, vocational, and military-naval training schools or colleges. The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, the same to be immediately available, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray all necessary expenses of said joint commission, payment of said expenses to be made upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said joint commiss

Mr. Chairman, I think my association and acquaintance with the young men of this country and the families of the young men who make up the actual soldiery in times of war is second to that of no man in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman give me a couple of minutes more, just for a few more words?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the national-defense act provides for vocational training in the Army?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think it does in this kind or manner. Mr. KAHN. It provides for it in any manner that the Secretary of War desires to indulge in.

Mr. GARLAND. But there is no plan established for it by which the Secretary is directed to make munitions, to train in trades, or is there directions that he put such proposition in the enlistment of men.

Mr. KAHN. This bill carries an appropriation for it. Mr. DENT. Yes; this bill carries an appropriation for that

Mr. GARLAND. I want to say this, in connection therewith, that 85 per cent of the young men of this country who go to the public schools come out unfinished before they get through the high schools, and all of them come out with the purpose of doing something. At 16 or 17 or 18 years of age they can not go through high school for the reason that their condition at home and the situation of their parents will not permit it. come out to hunt for something to do in life. If a plan of this kind, teaching them a trade is prepared, and then call on them for three or four years of service at that time of life when they do not have a family on their hands enlistments will come. the Government make any or all the material they need in a situation of that kind, and teach the trade there, and pay the boys over and above the cost of their teaching; and in that manner I think you will have no trouble in getting all the young men of the right kind, not the kind that are unfit, but the kind you call on in trouble always—the boys of the mill, the factory, and the farm. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had that permission be-

Mr. BOOHER. I desire to extend my remarks by printing in the Record a letter addressed to myself by the William C. Powell Manufacturing Co., of St. Joseph, Mo., tendering to the Government of the United States, free of charge, the use of their plant in case of emergency. This company is engaged in the manufacture of clothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting therein the document indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

ST. JOSEPH, Mo., February 14, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Me. Booher: I wish to offer, through you, to the United States Government, without cost, that they can share and be benefited by it, the use of my patent during the life of it for one-piece suits, suitable for work training, or service garments. Wherein they can have all contractors making up Government goods use same for all uses indoor or out, and in any climate, for United States Government use door or out, and in any change, only.

The garment can be made of any weight fabric. Saves yardage over two-piece suits. Has more freedom; in fact, all or more than the inclosed circular and letter tell about. See what it saves.

Various changes could be made in the make up as to collar, pockets, etc., which would not change the patent. This garment can be handled by any manufacturer of overalls, men's coats, pants, etc. The saving of yardage would mean a great amount, as well as having a practical garment of freedom. I will agree to furnish all details as to prices and patterns, etc. and patterns, etc.

You will no doubt remember the writer, as you put and had passed a bill in the House abolishing prison labor in the overall industry a

Will be glad to hear from you if you think the United States Government would handle, and if such is the case, will have the details prepared for a bill.

Thanking you and hoping to hear from you, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

W. C. POWELL

Mr. HILLIARD rose.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be considered closed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and amendments be considered closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

CHIEF OF COAST ARTILLERY.

CHIEF OF COAST ARTHLERY.

Coast Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va.: For incidental expenses of the school, including chemicals, stationery, printing and binding; hardware; materials; cost of special instruction of officers detailed as instructors; employment of temporary, technical, or special services; extra-duty pay to soldiers necessarily employed for periods not less than 10 days as artificers on work in addition to and not strictly in line with their military duties, such as carpenters, blacksmiths, draftsmen, printers, lithographers, photographers, engine drivers, telegraph operators, teamsters, wheelwrights, masons, machinists, painters, overseers, laborers; for office furniture and fixtures, machinery, and unforeseen expenses, $10,000.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the gentleman allow this paragraph to be read to the end.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been read, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KAHN. No. On page 6 there are three-fourths of a page, a part of that paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken. We are considering this bill by paragraphs, and not by titles.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has the right to get in now. The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the bill is read by paragraphs, and not by sections.

Mr. KAHN. There are quite a number of sections belonging to this paragraph on the next page, down to almost the bottom of the page.

Mr. DENT. Down to line 14.

Mr. KAHN. No; line 23, page.

Mr. KAHN. No; line 23, page 6. The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from California this question: We read, commencing with line 13, as I understand it?

Mr. KAHN.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California claim that on page 6 down to the "Office of the Signal Officer" it is all one paragraph?

all one paragraph.

Mr. KAHN. I do. The Chair will notice the end of line 25 of page 5. It is a semicolon,
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read. The Chair will notice the punctuation at

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HILLIARD. If the gentleman from California does not want me to speak, all right. I have not hitherto taken up the time of the House,

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to the gentleman's speaking. Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I understand on an appropriation bill the measure is considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the Chair to rule that in the construction of the pending bill, on pages 5 and 6, the paragraph does not end at the end of line 25, page 5, but continues on to the following page, with succeeding paragraphs. Those items in succeeding paragraphs involve separate and distinct proposals, all pertaining, it is true, to the Coast Artillery, but not to the Coast Artillery school at Fort Monroe, Va. If they all pertained to the Coast Artillery school at Fort Monroe, Va., then they might be held to be a part of the same paragraph; but the items under consideration, and found on page 6, relate to the Coast Artillery service, separate and distinct items, and the mere fact that the punctuation marked at the end of line 25 is a semicolon does not make the succeeding paragraphs a portion of the paragraph found on page 5.

Mr. DENT. I want to suggest that there is no question before the committee at this time, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr.

HILLIARD] having withdrawn his request.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Staf-FORD] raised a point of order. The Chair asked the gentleman from California [Mr. Kahn] if it was his contention that all this matter was so related that the paragraph as such continued down to the words "Office of the Chief Signal Officer," and he said it was one paragraph. The Chair, without looking at it, directed the Clerk to read. That is the situation. If no one desires to speak, the Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of engines, generators, motors, machines, measuring instruments, special apparatus and materials for the division of the enlisted specialists. $7,000;

For purchase of special apparatus and materials and for experimental purposes for the department of artillery and land defense,

$3,000;
For purchase of engines, generators, motors, machines, measuring instruments, special apparatus and materials for the department of engineering and mine defense, $5,500;
For purchase and binding of professional books treating of military and scientific subjects for library, for use of school, and for temporary use in coast defenses, $2,500; in all, $28,000.

Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation.

Provided further, That purchase and exchange of typewriting machines, to be paid for from this appropriation, may be made at the special price allowed to schools teaching stenography and typewriting without obligating typewriter companies to supply these machines to all departments of the Government at the same price.

Mr. STAKEORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquire.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Throughout this bill there are paragraphs containing provisos, some that have relation and others that have no relation to the paragraph preceding. We have now before us an instance of the latter kind. I should like to have a ruling of the Chair whether, for instance, the two paragraphs on page 6, in lines 14 to 23, are to be considered as one paragraph or are they to be considered as two paragraphs as printed in the bill? Each proviso is concluded with a period.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is going to make a ruling on that subject, I will suggest that a paragraph is a paragraph. I can give the Chair one instance. In the Agricultural bill in one place it carries general language, and without reaching the point of a period it carries the items for the national forests. Most of the items consist of one line each, and each item is considered, and always has been considered, a separate paragraph, because that is the meaning of the word I do not think there is any question about that. paragraph." The fact that they are related does not make any difference.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 12, on page 6,

In all. $28,000.

Meaning that all the items in the paragraph amount to $28,000. I take it that that would mean that the various sections are all a part of the one paragraph.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can find a much longer argument on that subject by turning to page 21, where it says, in line 5-

Total pay of the Army-

So many dollars. So that would be the end of a paragraph. All of the appropriation bills usually provide at the end of a certain office or a certain class, "in all, so many dollars," but that has nothing to do with the paragraphing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that while a heading like this may properly be broken up into small subdivisions, he treats them all as one paragraph. That is the way the Chair is disposed to look at it. The Clerk will continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the sum of $1,000,000 may be expended out of the appropriations provided by the act of August 29, 1916, for the purchase of sites and construction of buildings for aviation schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order

Mr. STAFFORD. Before passing this item I wish to inquire what is purposed by the department in the item under consideration? I wish to inquire whether the department made any recommendation for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for purchase of sites and construction of buildings for the aviation school?

Mr. DENT. The department has made a recommendation, and I was just in the act of offering some amendments that would meet the recommendation of the War Department.

In the act of August 29, 1916, we made an appropriation of something over $13,000,000 for aviation purposes. The Comptroller has ruled that the department can not pay out of that sum any money for the purchase of sites, or for buildings in order to house the machines or to take care of them. The Secretary of War asks that so much of the appropriation made last year as will be necessary for that purpose be made immediately available in this bill out of the appropriation of last year. It does not increase the appropriation that we are giving in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is generally recognized that the entire amount of the money appropriated last year for aviation purposes will not be used this year, that a good portion of it, $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 or more perhaps, will lapse into the Treasury

Mr. DENT. They will have about $6,000,000 left, and they want to use $4,500,000 of that for these purposes, and I was about to offer an amendment in order to meet the recommendation of the War Department on that subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before I withdraw the point of order I would like to hear the amendment read that is proposed to be offered.

Mr. DENT. I will offer the amendment first.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment can be read for informa-tion, but can not be offered while the point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send his amendment to the desk and it will be read. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Dent: Page 8, line 13, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000"; page 8, line 14, after the word "appropriations," insert the words "for aviation"; page 8, line 16, after the word "the," insert the words "acquisition by," and after the word "purchase" insert the words "condemnation or otherwise"; page 8, line 17, strike out the period and insert a comma after the word "schools," and add the following: "post experimental stations, and proving grounds for the United States Army."

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, these are read merely for information, Mr. Chairman. I think it is owing to the committee that some explanation be made of this radical amendment increasing the amount from $1,000,000 to $4,000,000. Is it purposed to increase these appropriations, as the Naval Committee increased their appropriation by some $15,000,000, as the result of afterthoughts of the department?

Mr. DENT. Of course, this does not increase the appropriation which was made last year. It is also true that if sum is not used by the last of June it will be turned back into

This proposition has been submitted both to the Appropriations Committee and the Military Committee of the House by the Secretary of War, and he writes the following short letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 6, 1917.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: I beg leave to inclose a suggested amendment to be incorporated into the urgent deficiency bill. The development of aviation in the Army of course depends upon suitable grounds, and throughout the United States there is now accumulating a very large amount of valuable property of the Aviation Section for which proper housing appliances are absolutely necessary. The appropriation made last year was a very ample provision for the purpose of machines, but made no provision for exercising grounds, storage facilities, etc. This amendment, if incorporated, will authorize the use of a part of the funds appropriated last year for those purposes and, of course, calls for no new appropriation, but merely larger authority with regard to the appropriation already made. The auditor and comptroller have already ruled that the funds appropriated last year, under the limitations contained in the appropriation bill, can not be expended for these purposes.

Respectfully,

Now, the Secretary of War not only wrote this letter, but he tells me that he must have this in order to properly house and take care of the machines

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes. Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Secretary of War state where he desires to spend this increased appropriation?

Mr. DENT. He does not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not the whole matter in a very vague condition, and does the gentleman think we ought to appropriate this enormous sum of money for sites until the department states where they want the sites?

Mr. DENT. I think the matter is of such a character that it ought to be left to the discretion of the administrative officers.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. STAFFORD.

Mr. DENT.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the amendment go further than provide sites for aviation? He could use the $4,000,000 for the purchase of posts and an experimental school for aviation. Further than that, the matter is before the Committee on Appropriations, which is at present considering the estimates by the department for urgent deficiencies.

Mr. DENT. I have recently had a conversation with the chairman of the Appropriations Corumittee, who tells me that he would not undertake to put anything of that kind in his bill, and he expects this to be taken care of in the Army appropriation bill

Mr. CALDWELL. All the money appropriated by us, amounting to millions, has been spent, and a part of it is still under contract in the acquisition of certain aviation machinery that will deteriorate until it is housed. At present there are no houses for these machines, although we have the land for them. They must have the additional appropriate in order that the machines are the machines and the machines are t chinery, perishable property, exposed to the weather, may be properly taken care of—not only that which we have but that which is under contract and that which they expect to buy out of the appropriation.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Has the gentleman any information as to whether it will take one million or four million dollars?

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand the department asked for $4,500,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For housing this property or acquiring the ground? Mr. CALDWELL.

Both.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that there were six million left over of the appropriation of last year?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that is my information.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Then Congress voted that much more money than the department has found use for.

Mr. DENT. The department, as I understand, was under the impression that under the appropriation of last year they could use a portion of the fund for acquiring sites to erect buildings to house the machines. The comptroller has ruled that they can not, and the purpose of this amendment is to utilize the money for that purpose

Mr. FIELDS. I want to say to the gentleman that $3,000,000 and over is asked to purchase sites.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The appropriation bill carrying that sum was approved August 9, 1916, so there has been no time to expend the money.

Mr. DENT. That is true; and when we had the Chief of the Signal Corps before the committee the law had been in operation only about five months.

Mr. CALDWELL. There was appropriated $14,281,000, and there are $6,000,000 not yet expended; and the comptroller said that under the wording of the bill it could not be used for the structures necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman if the Secretary of War or other officers have submitted any estimate in connection with the letter asking for the increased appropriation?

Mr. DENT. No; they have submitted no definite plan or proposal in regard to it.

Mr. McKENZIE. They are simply asking that we take $4,000,000 of the money appropriated last year for the construction of flying machines and turn it over to the War Department to expend in the purchase of land and the erection of buildings to take care of flying machines.

Mr. DENT. That is very true.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that when the matter was considered before the committee we felt that a million dollars was a very reasonable amount to turn over to them at this time for that purpose, and that we needed flying machines rather than land?

Mr. DENT. It is true that the committee thought that a million dollars would be sufficient, but we did not have any more information about it than the War Department has submitted

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that they did not state at what point or places in the country the money was to be expended or the land purchased?

That is very true. Mr. DENT.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT.

Mr. KAHN. I think there was an estimate submitted to the committee of $3,000,000 to be appropriated out of the funds that were to go for the purchase of land and putting up the buildings during the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. FIELDS. That is correct.

Mr. KAHN. And therefore the War Department took cognizance of this subject in its estimates. The committee thought, in view of the testimony given before it by Gen. Squier, that probably they could utilize a sum of money appropriated last year for the purchase of land and the construction of buildings. In fact, the department or the bureau undertook to do that very thing out of the $13,000,000 appropriated, but the Comptroller of the Treasury held that under the wording of the law they could not do it. Therefore the department bought the flying machines but had no buildings in which to put them and no place to try them out at the various posts in the country. This money is now intended to allow the bureau to buy the necessary land and put up the necessary buildings to house the machines that will be required.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. KAHN.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Has the gentleman any information as to how much of the $4,500,000 is to be used for buildings and how much for land?

Mr. KAHN. I have not. I have simply the Secretary's letter for my guidance, which I heard the chairman of the committee read

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That gives no detail as to that proposition at all?

Mr. KAHN. No

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It simply asks for the money. Is the gentleman aware that the Government already has hundreds of reservations scattered all over the country?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes; I am quite aware of that. There is a reservation at Fort Sill, Okla., but I do not think the Government wants to take these machines out there and try them out. I do not think that would be a proper place for them. think that the Government wants to try these machines out near the seaboard, where they will undoubtedly be used, and where the department will have to have land if they

Mr. FIELDS. Is it not stated also that these sites would have to be purchased where the atmospheric conditions were favor-

That is only for the schools. After the men become expert fliers they can fly in any atmosphere.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it not a matter of record before the committee that they have already purchased a large site upon the Potomac?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I believe at Hampton, Va. Mr. SHALLENBERGER. For something like $350,000?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know how much they paid for it. There was an appropriation of $300,000 for that purpose. They have purchased that site; but if the gentleman knows anything about aeronautics, he must know they have to have large tracts of land near the posts where these machines are to be located in order to successfully maneuver and fly them, and those the Government does not happen to have at the present time.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.
Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague if, in his judgment, $1,000,000 would not be sufficient to erect shelter to cover all of the machines that we will have during the year 1918?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, possibly half a million dollars might do that. It might put up the buildings, but that does not get away from the fact that the department must have sufficient land area on which to fly these machines, and that that land must be near the Army posts.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.
Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, on page 999 of the hearings Gen. Scriven was before the committee, and the question of the use of this $3,000,000 which at that time was asked was under discussion. The general testified that in addition to the hangars in which the machines were to be kept there must be provided at Hampton workshops, experimental shops, places for storing ammunition, bombs, etc., and garages for the necessary automobiles So that as I understand it this $4,500,000 they ask for, or the $4,000,000 proposed in this amendment, is for the purpose of putting up the necessary improvements to the real estate and the purchase of some small amount of land for the purpose of having the right kind of station or school for the aviation We have appropriated some $14,000,000 which they can spend between now and the 1st day of July, 1917.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In just a moment. If they go ahead spending the money for tools and for flying machines and all those things, they will have to be kept under canvas, as it is being kept, according to the testimony on the same page, at Columbus. If such course is pursued, we are wasting our money, throwing it away, and under these circumstances I think we ought to have a chance to vote upon it. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I want to ask the gentleman a question. He said this money they could spend. Has it not been demonstrated that they can not spend it, because they want to spend it now for something not appropriated for? They have not been able to find a place to spend it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not say that.

Mr. DENT. They were under the impression they could not spend it for this purpose until the comptroller gave his decision.

Mr. CALDWELL. We appropriated it upon their request a year ago, and now they want words put into the statute so that they can spend it as they contemplated a year ago.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a very important subject and the Members ought to hear it. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20783), finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called, whereupon 279 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary status at the time the point of no quorum was made was that the gentleman from Alabama had submitted certain amendments to be read for information, and the point of order had been reserved to the section of the bill to which those amendments were directed. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist on his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, from the discussion which has taken place since the point of order was reserved, it is apparent from the expressions that a great number of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs are opposed to this radical increase of appropriation from $1,000,000 to $4,000,000. I have examined the hearings and I find that the head of the service stated that there are some propositions under consideration which would involve, in case the tracts are purchased, the expenditure of more than $1,000,000, and unless I can have some understanding with the chairman of the committee that he will not press his amendment to increase the amount I shall feel constrained to make the point of order. Even though I dis-sent from this $1,000,000 of appropriation, I shall not oppose it; but I do not believe it is good legislation to come here merely upon the recommendation of the Secretary of War without any full consideration being given by the committee and increase that amount by $3,000,000.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin accept an amount of $2,000,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I think from expressions of members of the committee that this matter was considered by the committee, and it was decided by the committee that $1,000,000 should be the amount. In fact, there are members who have not participated in the discussion or given it consideration who are averse to this policy of expending these large amounts of money. I believe that it is necessary to allow the War Department to equip some building with the necessary machinery in conjunction with this aviation school so as to aid the aviation service in connection with the Army.

Mr. DENT. As I understand it they require some appropriation for houses that will house and take care of the machines, and this $1,000,000 will not take care of them, and if I insist on the amendment the gentleman will insist on the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will. Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this is subject to the point of order. The decisions are very clear. I refer the Chair to paragraphs 3591 and 3592 in volume 4 of Hinds' Prece-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserved the point of order and never stated what his point of order was or to what language it was directed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order is that it is new legis-lation not authorized by law, and that it is appropriating money carried in another appropriation act for a different purpose than what was stated in the original appropriation act.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I read from decision No. 3591, fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents:

The reappropriation of an unexpended balance for an object authorized by law may be made on an appropriation bill.

And from paragraph 3592 of Hinds' Precedents:

On February 14, 1907, the naval appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when the Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, line 16, insert after the word "articles," "And provided further, That the unexpended balances under appropriations 'Provisions, Navy, for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1905, and 1906, are hereby reapportioned for 'Provisions, Navy, for fiscal year ending June 30, 1908."

reapportioned for 'Provisions, Navy, for iscal year enoing June 30, 1908.'"

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, made a point of order.

After debate the Chairman (who was the Hon. James Breck Perkins, of New York) held:

"The Chair is of the opinion that the question that has been raised has been covered by previous decisions of those occupying the chair, and in a moment the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to two decisions which he finds. In one of these decisions it was held: 'That a reappropriation of an unexpended balance for an object authorized by law may be made on an appropriation bill.'

"Now, in answer to the position stated by the gentleman from New York a moment ago, a second decision held 'That a reappropriation of a sum required by law to be covered into the Treasury was not a change of law."

"It seems to the Chair that these two decisions precisely cover the questions presented. Money has been appropriated for an object authorized by law and is now reappropriated for a shmilar object. That is the decision made by predecessors in the chair, and it has been held not to be a change of law and a thing that could properly be done upon an appropriation bill and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order."

The above decision from which I quoted directly says that a

The above decision from which I quoted directly says that a reappropriation of an unexpended balance for an object authorized by law may be made on an appropriation bill. The question arises whether this is or is not an appropriation authorized by law. I have not the Book of Estimates here, but the gentleman from Alabama can tell me the law under which the appropriation was made if he will look in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. KAHN. August 29, 1916.
Mr. GARDNER. August 29, 1916.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask in that connection if it is agreed that this sum of $1,000,000 is an unexpended balance. There is no controversy about that?

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the application of that fund is to the purchase of sites and construction of buildings for the Aviation What is the authority for that application?

Mr. GARDNER. I am not sufficiently familiar with the act of August, 1916, to say from memory, but I can find the section in a minute or two.

Mr. DENT. I have not found it in the estimates. But I was going to make this statement, Mr. Chairman. As I understand it, the appropriation carried in the appropriation bill for the support of the Army, of August 29 of last year, provided generally for so many millions of dollars for this purpose, and the comptroller has ruled that under that appropriation they can not purchase any sites or erect any buildings to house the machines that they may purchase, or lease any of them. There is no way in which to do it. And I want to confess, Mr. Chairman, that, so far as I am concerned, I think it is subject to a point of order, and that is the reason I said that I would withdraw my amendment if the point of order was going to be insisted on.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the same appropriation bill which carries this appropriation for aviation purposes carried an appropriation of $300,000 for the specific purpose for which they now seek to use this money, and that money has been spent for land, showing that it was the intention of Congress when they appropriated that money to have it spent for that specific purpose

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my proposed amend-

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of order.
Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman withdraw the entire amend-

Mr. DENT. I think the point of order would lie on the other. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that the amendment is withdrawn and the point of order is withdrawn?

Mr. STAFFORD. The point of order is withdrawn on the statement of the gentleman that he does not intend to press the amendment increasing the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand the point of order is intended to be withdrawn, and the amendment likewise?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, without objection, that will be

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand now that the point of order having been withdrawn, there are some wordsand I do not want to take advantage and ask for a larger appropriation, although I am in favor of one-there are some words that ought to go into this section, even if it carries $1,000,000. I do not want to take an unfair advantage with the gentleman, who withdraws the point of order. If he means-

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not wish to enlarge the scope of it. have no objection to the insertion of the word "acquisition." Mr. CALDWELL. The last one may be grounds for the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. That extends it away beyond the scope of any mere authorization. I would object to that.

Mr. CALDWELL. The first two amendments, I understand, then, will be in order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not press the point of order against those amendments

The CHAIRMAN. What is the agreement of the gentlemen?

Mr. CALDWELL. I move to amend by inserting after the word "appropriations," in line 14, page 8, the words "for aviation," and after the word "the," in line 16, the words "acquisition by," and after the word "purchase," in the same line, the words "by condemnation or otherwise."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 14, after the word "appropriations," insert the words for aviation." On page 8, line 16, after the word "the," insert the words "acquisition by."

quisition by."

On page 8, line 16, after the word "purchase," insert the words "condemnation or otherwise," so that the proviso as amended will read:

"Provided further, That the sum of $1,000,000 may be expended out of the appropriations for aviation provided by the act of August 29, 1916, for the acquisition by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of sites and construction of buildings for aviation schools."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, that is all one amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the second amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford], because I do not want to take an unfair advantage of him. After the word "buildings," in line 16 of the same section, I want to add, "the improvement of land and water front contiguous thereto."

The reason I propose that is this: At one of the stations we find we can not use the hydroplanes for the reason that the water is too shallow, and they must do some work in connection therewith. I want to put in these words in order that the work may be done. It will cost only a few dollars, but it ought to be done.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand the Committee on Appropriations are providing for hydroplanes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; for the Army. This is only hydroplanes for the Aviation School, not for the Army.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have seen the station at Absecon, near Atlantic City, and-

Mr. CALDWELL. They do not have the right kind of a place

Mr. STAFFORD. They have only 10 feet of shore and a channel right in front.

Mr. CALDWELL. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will not.
Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I shall object, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska objects. Mr. CALDWELL. I will withdraw the amendment, then.
The CHAIRMAN. There is a third amendment still to be submitted to a vote. The question is on the third amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the fourth amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter motor-propelled vehicles, aeroplanes, engines, and parts thereof may be exchanged in part payment for new equipment of the same or similar character, to be used for the same purpose as those proposed to be exchanged.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, before we pass from this important section I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, by far the greater portion of the time to-day has been consumed in discussion of matters entirely foreign to the bill supposed to be under consideration. Therefore it seems to me appropriate before we pass from this important section appropriating for the Signal Corps that I, as a member of the committee, submit a few words in explanation of the large appropriation we have proposed here.

The committee has come to the conclusion that everyone who studies military affairs at the present time must come, that aviation is one of the most important factors, if not the most important factor, in modern warfare. There has been a revolution, so far as warfare is concerned, caused by the invention of aircraft.

When we developed the method known as indirect fire for artillery, which was not very long ago, whereby we were able to conceal our batteries behind a sloping hill and fire at an unseen enemy, we thought we had gone a long way in the development While yet engaged in completely adjusting ourselves to this new and more scientific use of artillery along comes this new agency, which requires that instead of figuring in two dimensions we must figure in three dimensions. Instead of being able to hide behind a sloping hill, entirely safe from view, it is now necessary, if concealment is to be had, that the battery be concealed either in a building or by trees or by some other method to shield it from view from the sky.

The means of concealing artillery and machine guns as already developed in the European war are varied, ingenious, and extremely interesting. Houses, sheds, and trees wherever available are used. A harmless-looking hut or cabin back of the line upon closer investigation reveals a battery of 75's, one gun on the front veranda, two more in the parlor or bed cham-ber, and the fourth beside the kitchen stove. Sheds are erected for the purpose, and other sheds to deceive the enemy, while overnight clumps of trees are taken up bodily and transplanted into protecting groups. All possible means of concealment and every imaginable ruse to deceive are resorted to, because the depends upon escaping the watchful eye of the airman and the still more searching eye of his ever-clicking camera.

By the aid of aircraft the commander is now able to send his scouts forward to observe the line of outposts, to locate the line of battle, to see the position of the supports and the reserve. In fact all that valuable information that formerly required reconnaissance, oftentimes reconnaissance in force, or a considerable battle to ascertain can now be secured by sending out one aeroplane to examine the country. With the aeroplane, by the use of photography, it is now possible to locate every object on the ground viewed, so that by means of triangulation the distance of every object on the ground under consideration is known. An aeroplane goes up in the air with photographic instruments and takes a photograph of a certain section of the ground. Another aeroplane takes a photograph of another section, and so on over the whole ground. These photographs are placed together, making a continuous map. The next day another photograph is taken of each section so that there is exact knowledge of what changes are going on from day to day all over the ground. It is absolutely necessary to conceal batteries of artillery and machine guns, for if the enemy knows exactly where they are located, and he will sdrely know if permitted to send over his aircraft, he is able to land upon them with his artillery fire. It was but a short time since it was a brave saying to "stand by your guns." Nowadays, having ascertained by the use of the aeroplane the exact range of a battery, it becomes impossible to "stand by your guns." That slogan must now give way to another not so inspiring, but under present conditions far wiser, something like this: "When once your range is found take to your dugouts," which must be prepared in advance.

Within three short years it has come to pass that the aeroplane has become the most important factor in directing not only the fire of artillery, but also the movements of armies; so that the army which is lacking in aircraft is going to be at the mercy of its opponent having superior aircraft.

It was formerly said of the cavalry that it was the eyes of the army. That is no longer true, except in a very different sense. The aeroplane now is the eyes of the army, and without it an army would be not only blind but entirely helpless. For these reasons large appropriations were made last year and large appropriations are proposed in this bill. Our weakness in this all-important service must be remedied. Every effort is now being bent in that direction, because we realize that of all the modern agencies of warfare, the submarine not excepted, the most important one and the one in which we are most deficient is the aeroplane. It is the part of wisdom to understand clearly that unless we make large appropriations, and unless the executive departments in the expending of these appropriations make headway, we shall, in case of war, find ourselves in a sad situation so far as the air service is concerned. While our present situation is far from comforting, nevertheless the prospect ahead of us is very bright. We are indeed fortunate in having come to the head of the Aviation Service at this critical juncture such a man as Brig. Gen. George O. Squier. His unusual ability, training, and enthusiasm for his work, as well as the beginnings he has made are good ground for hope and confidence that we have entered upon a new era in the development of this most important agency for national defense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for seven minutes. Is there ob-

There was no objection. Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, ever since this bill has been under discussion the House has been entertained from time to time with varying opinions from Members on both sides of this center aisle as to what they think the conduct of this Congress should be in the present international situation. For one I do not believe there is a single Member in the House who has received very much information. It is true that we have been highly entertained by the gentlemen who have spoken; but it has all been without profit, even to us or to the country. A few days ago an editorial came under my notice which appeared in a Boston newspaper, and because it has so much real sound sense in it I propose to offer it at this itme as a contribution to the debate which has been going on since the Army bill has been before the House. This editorial appears every existence of the guns, as well as the lives of the gunners, headed "Give the President a chance." It is as follows:

GIVE THE PRESIDENT A CHANCE.

GIVE THE PRESIDENT A CHANCE.

Give President Wilson a fair and decent chance. To-day he is being pulled and hauled by men who, professing to be good citizens and partiotic Americans, are doing what they can to counteract his influence and to convince other nations that he does not represent the sentiment of this Nation.

Three groups are now deliberately engaged in trying to belittle the President. They may be classified as follows:

First. The professional pacifists, or peace-without-honor patriots, who labor to induce Germany to believe that, no matter what she may do in defiance of our rights as a nation and as plain citizens, the sentiment of the United States is against armed protest.

Second. The violent and seemingly incurable proallies, whose constant demand since the war began has been that we enter the war, not in behalf of our own rights, but as a plutocratic, philanthropic annex of the allies.

Third. A dangerous and unpatriotic element which is conjuring up a war with Japan and fanning every day the flame of Japanese resentment against this country, not because they believe that Japan is anxious to make war against us, but to cover up their own allegiance to Germany, which they are not frank enough publicly to proclaim, but which is as patent as their constructive disloyalty to their own country.

Those three groups represent only a small percentage of the people of the United States; but any one of them can apparently make more noise than all of the pro-Americans combined.

Give the President a chance! Suppress the pro-European shriekers!

Now, Mr. Chairman, because I think I am pronouncedly pro-American, and because I firmly believe that every man in this Congress is for America first, I was one of those who this noon voted to strike from the Record the words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bailey] in which he attacked the loyalty of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. The gentleman from Massachusetts needs no defense at my hands. Ever since his membership in Congress he has shown that he is able to take care of himself at any and all times; but because I am unwilling to subscribe to any such attack, suggesting that my colleague from my State is more loyal to Great Britain than he is to the country of his birth, I gladly and heartily voted to strike those words from the RECORD. [Applause.] If a similar attack is made on any other Member of this Congress' I shall cheerfully do as I did to-day. I believe steadfastly in the absolute loyalty and devotion of all my col-leagues to this country and the Stars and Stripes, which spread their sheltering folds over the head of our beloved Speaker. [Applause.]

I do not always agree with the ideas of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I might say that in most of his contributions to the discussion which has been engaging the attention of Congress I find myself on the other side. But he is a man of courage, of patriotism, of loyalty, and when the test came in his youth he cheerfully responded to the call to the colors in the Spanish-American War. [Applause.] He will do it again if his country needs him.

While I believe, Mr. Chairman, that it would be monstrous to plunge our country into war because of the sinking of any American ship carrying munitions to the belligerents, and I firmly believe that it would be more than a crime to plunge this country into war for the sake of those so-called "Americans" who go out as cattle valets on steamers sailing from East Boston and New York almost every other day, I am unwilling to believe that the great President of this Republic can be persuaded to any such action. Real Americans have judged already the cattle-boat adventurers, and I dare say there is not a man within the sound of my voice who would give them even a cup of coffee to hide their rum breaths, let alone fight and die for their "honor." These are the types that would bring endless misery on our land, because they would court death defiantly in places where they have no right, save at their own peril. One real American boy is worth tons of these cattle pushers, and I have faith that Woodrow Wilson stands for the American boys.

And, Mr. Chairman, we must not forget another thing that occurs to me at this moment, namely, that we did not permit vessels flying the English or any other flag to pass through the lines of our blockading fleets in the Civil War when they were attempting to carry supplies or cash to the Southern States. We must be on the watch for tricky England in our present crisis. She will "plant" an American on her merchantment, if needs be, an "American" who can be easily bought to sail on a ship loaded with materials of war. But Woodrow Wilson knows more about conditions, in my judgment, than all of us here put together. So I say to you, let us be calm, let us refuse to be either a plutocratic or philanthropic annex of either the allies or the central powers, and, above all, let us give the President a chance. [Applause.]

I want to call to the attention of the House another editorial from a Boston newspaper, the Globe, which appears in to-day's issue over the signature of "Uncle Dudley," one of the ablest one of the ablest and best-posted contributors in this country. It is as follows:

BETTER FOR US TO LOOK BEFORE WE LEAP,

Many of our American ships are lying idle at their docks. They do not make ready to put to sea. Their owners clamor for protection from Washington. They are told that they may arm, but suitable guns are not to be had in the open market. Meanwhile, freight destined for European ports is congesting the railroads. Many trainloads of provisions are sidetracked. Some of our export trade is waiting for a change in the international situation or for a development in the administration attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that leave by order of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair is in error; the order was for those "who have spoken."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand it. The Chair understood it was those who had spoken or would speak.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. On page 3879, Mr. Chairman, the RECORD says:

Mr. Dent. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken upon this bill be allowed five legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks.

The Speaker. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

The CHAIRMAN. That is sufficient. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system: For defraying the cost of such extensions, betterments, operation, and maintenance of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1919, from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system which have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, the extent of such extension and betterments and the cost thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War, $50,000: Provided, That hereafter the Signal Corps, in its operation of military telegraph lines, cables, or radio stations, is authorized to collect forwarding charges due connecting commercial telegraph or radio companies for the transmission of Government radiograms or telegrams over their lines, and to this end it can present vouchers to disbursing officers for payment or file claims with auditors of the Treasury Department for the amount of such forwarding charges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think that the phraseology should be further limited so that it shall not be operative unless approved by the Secretary of War?
Mr. DENT. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. DENT. What is the gentleman's point?
Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the authorization should not go into effect unless first approved by the Secretary of War, and I was going to suggest to the chairman to insert, after the word "authorized," in line 10, the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War," and then, in line 13, after the word "and," to insert the words "under such regulations as may be pre-scribed by the Secretary of War." I do not think it is advisable to enact into permanent law an authorization to the Signal Corps to collect charges without the Secretary of War having the power to discontinue them or to make regulations governing the subject.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection to those amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and offer the following amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 10, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War," and after the word "and," in line 13, page 9, insert the words "under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] called especial attention to the message of the President to Congress in which he announced the severance of diplomatic relations with Germany. Now, when I heard the President read that vastly significant document I thought, and then remarked, that it contained one error in a statement of fact—an error which seemed to be rather important in the sense that the truth-exact knowledge of the factsalways important in serious discussion.

The President said:

Let me remind the Congress that on the 18th of April last, in view of the sinking on the 24th of March of the cross-channel passenger steamer Sussex by a German submarine, without summons or warning, and the consequent loss of the lives of several citizens of the United States, who were passengers aboard her—

And so forth.

But it is not true that several citizens of the United States lost their lives on that British steamer. I have here a copy of the New York World, and on the first page, right-hand column of that paper for March 28, 1916, are the headlines:

No American life lost on the Sussex. Germany ready to disayow the Then follows this dispatch:

WASHINGTON, March 27.

Reports received to-day by the State Department from Ambassador Page, in London, and Ambassador Sharp, in Paris, have established that no American lives were lost on board the channel passenger steamer

And so forth.

In the same issue of the World appears an editorial, from which I quote the following:

One paragraph in President Wilson's speech at St. Louis February 8 has a peculiar application to the Sussex case:

"Gentlemen, the commanders of submarines have their instructions, and those instructions are consistent for the most part with the laws of nations; but one reckless commander of a submarine, choosing to put his private interpretation upon what his Government wishes him to do, might set the world on fire."

The editorial continues:

No American lives were lost on the Sussex-

And so forth.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I am very much interested in the statement of the gentleman as to past facts. Was there not in that message a statement substantially like this, that it is "taken for granted that all neutral Governments will take the same course" that had just been taken by the President?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is referring to what the President seemed to assume.

Mr. SLOAN.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been referring to what purported to be a statement of fact.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not think the gentleman gets the purport of my question. He is the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and as such must keep in close touch with the actions of the other neutral nations of the world. I want to ask, as a matter of information, whether any neutral nation on earth has followed the course taken by the President of the United States in the severance of the diplomatic relations. with Germany?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I can say no more than that my information is that no other nation has followed the lead of the United States in that regard. I can not state positively as a fact that that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICERS OF THE LINE.

For pay of officers of the line, $11,500,000.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the proviso beginning on line 24, page 9, and ending on line 23, page 10, be read at this point in the bill, instead of and in the place of the words printed in the bill. The proviso should come after the figures "$11,500,000," which is for the pay of officers, and not after the provision for the additional pay to officers for length of service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the proviso referred to shall be read and considered immediately following line 22, page 9. Is there ob-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have no objection to that, and to having it read, if the gentleman will then move to rise.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that if there is any controversy over the proviso I will.

Mr. MANN. There is a controversy over it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read the proviso. The period after the figures "$11,500,000" should be stricken out and a semicolon inserted, and then the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid to any officer of the line of the Army who shall be appointed or promoted in violation of any of the terms next hereinafter specified: That of the whole number of officers of Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Infantry, and of Engineers serving with the enlisted force of the Corps of Engineers necessary to fill vacancies created or caused in said arms of the service by reason of the second increment, authorized by said arms by act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, not more than one-fourth shall be appointed or promoted until, exclusive of enlisted men belonging to said arms on June 30, 1916, at least one-fourth of the second increment of enlisted men authorized for said arms by said act shall have been enlisted; not more than one-half of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least one-half of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; and not more than three-fourths of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least three-fourths of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted; and not more than three-fourths of said whole number of officers shall be appointed or promoted until at least three-fourths of said increment of enlisted men shall have been enlisted. And all officers promoted in accordance with the terms of this proviso shall take rank, respectively, from the dates on which their promotions shall have become lawful under the terms of this proviso.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that, and at this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I have sent to the desk, which is rather long, the amendment to be considered pending, subject, of course, to any point of order to which it may be subject, without having it read now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can have it printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

Mr. TILSON. I make that request, that it be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House, and I shall offer it at this point.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on the amendment I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the amendment referred to may be printed in the RECORD for the purpose of information to be hereafter offered at the proper place. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Tilson: Page 10, line 23, after the word "proviso," insert:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that on the 22d of February, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of matters on the Speaker's table, that Washington's Farewell Address be read by Mr. Neely, of West Virginia. Is there objection?

[After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not object, but I think there may be a request made by some gentleman to address the House for a little while on Washington.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will not object to that, but on the afternoon before we will agree to meet earlier on the 22d. Mr. MANN. Very well.

SENATE.

SUNDAY, February 18, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 14, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR CLARKE.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice heretofore given, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read. The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Senate resolution 363.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. James P. Clarke, late a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That is a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the notable career of the late Senator James P. Clarke, of Arkansas, was closed by sudden death on October 1, 1916. Within four months after his demise the legislature of our State adopted a resolution providing for the erection of his statue in Statuary Hall in commemoration of his services to Arkansas and to the Nation.

commemoration of his services to Arkansas and to the Nation, Mr. Clarke was born in Yazoo City, Miss., August 18, 1854. He studied in the common schools and other local educational institutions of Mississippi and graduated in law at the University of Virginia in 1878. He entered upon the practice of his profession at Helena, Ark., in the following year. In 1886 his political career began with service in the lower house of the general assembly. In 1888 he was elected to the State senate for a term of four years, becoming president pro tempore of that body and ex officio lieutenant governor. In 1892 he was elected attorney general of Arkansas, and in 1894 governor of that State. Three years later he resumed the practice of law at Little Rock and actively pursued his profession until his election to the United States Senate in 1902. His service in this body began March 4, 1903, and his influential activities here continued until his death.

The action of the General Assembly of Arkansas in authorizing the statue of Senator Clarke to be placed in our national hall of fame within so short a time following his departure, is an unusual tribute. Considered in connection with the fact that he had many personal antagonisms and political controversies, the enmittee of which must have survived him, this tribute to his character and services is the more pronounced. This honor was prompted by appreciation of the personal integrity and marked ability which characterized the private and public career of Senator. Clarke rather than by affection and gratitude. There are other names associated with the progress of Arkansas that thrill her people with loving memories. Gen. Patrick Cleburne ranks with Jeb Stuart, Bedford Forrest, and Stonewall Jackson in courage and daring. The songs of Albert Pike, his chivalric, knightly character and striking personality, render him immortal.

Augustus H. Garland was among the Nation's greatest lawyers and statesmen. James K. Jones led his party for many years with courage, fidelity, and distinction. U. M. Rose was for the lifetime of a generation the most cultured man at the American bar. His knowledge of literature and art was not greater than his comprehension of the principles of justice and equity, which form the basis of our social, industrial, and political system. Any two of these are worthy of places in Statuary Hall, and it has been the difficulty of choosing among them that has kept vacant one of the niches reserved for Arkansas. Any man who pursues a long political career must incur enmities. One who is always aggressive and uncompromising naturally accumulates many political enemies. This was the case with Senator Clarke. Yet so highly is his memory esteemed in Arkansas that the legislature has already voted the resolution according him a place among the Nation's immortals.

PERSONAL HABITS.

One of the secrets of the success which attended the efforts of Senator Clarke is found in his personal habits. They were in every respect above reproach and criticism. Notwithstanding his impulsive nature, he never dissipated and never indulged in excesses in any form. He abstained from the use of alcohol and tobacco, was systematic in his labors, and regular in his hours of work and recreation. His exercise consisted almost entirely of walking. He never engaged in sports or pastimes. Had he done so, in all probability he would still survive. He lived in a state of almost constant tension. His amusements were limited to the pleasantries of conversations with intimate He rarely attended theaters, never read poetry, and found little pleasure in music. His greatest delight came from his knowledge and study of the peculiarities and personal traits of prominent men. Senator Clarke read comparatively few books. In speeches he rarely quoted any one; yet he possessed the greatest fund of valuable information and the smallest amount of useless knowledge of any man I have ever known. The sources of his knowledge, its accuracy and thoroughness, were sometimes subjects of amazement to his friends.

CHARACTERISTICS OF HIS PUBLIC SERVICE.

It is not practicable to review on this occasion the details of his public service. It is my good fortune to have known him all my life and to be familiar with the mainsprings of both his public and private conduct. They were integrity, courage, absolute independence, and consequent masterful will power. His public career was long. There was never an hour of it when his character and conduct were not under the scrutiny of friends and enemies, notwithstanding his detestation of notoricty; yet he was never suspicioned of dishonesty or of willful disloyalty to the public interests. He was always observed and frequently assailed, but never was his personal or official integrity impeached or questioned. He once said to me: "I have some confidences but no secrets."

Courage, both physical and moral, were an equally distinctive trait of this remarkable man. His physical courage was primitive, at times almost savage. Until late in life his habit was to invite conflict, never to avoid it. He had many personal encounters. The readiness with which he avenged an insult and the relentlessness with which he pursued an enemy were perhaps the least admirable traits of his otherwise marvelous character.

It is not often that moral and physical courage in equal proportions are combined in a single character, but in Senator Clarke extraordinary physical courage was equaled, if not excelled, by moral courage. He did not fear to take any stand, to advance against any measure which his judgment condemned, or to spring to the support of any principle which his conscience approved. He was the only public man I ever knew whom I regarded as absolutely free from demagoguery and every other form of political pretense or dissimulation. A great man who has served a generation in Congress once said:

I am as sincere in my public utterances and acts as the exigencies of politics will permit.

He spoke the truth. Next to Senator Clarke, that man approaches as nearly to absolute independence of thought and action in public matters as any man whom I have known. A great newspaper published in Arkansas once said, in substance:

Whatever one's personal feelings toward him may be, Senator CLARKE can not fairly be accused of any form of demogoguery.

Indeed, he was more likely to choose the unpopular than the popular position. The unqualified independence of Senator Clarke frequently brought him into opposition with his party associates. During the administration of President Roosevelt the Panama Canal legislation was opposed by the Democratic organization in the Senate. Its passage was accomplished, as Mr. Roosevelt has stated, largely through the exertions of Senator

CLARKE.

When the so-called Bristow amendment, the joint resolution providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote, was pending in the Senate many Democratic Senators from Southern States expressed the fear that force bills would result, and sought to modify the amendment so as to deny to the Federal Government control over elections. Senator Clarke declared that the preservation of the Government may in the future depend upon its control of the selection of its officers. He voted for the Bristow amendment and against the Bacon amendment giving to the States the power to fix the times, places, and manner of holding elections. The Bristow amendment became a part of the Constitution. His vote was indispensable to its passage. His contribution last Congress to the defeat of the ship-purchase bill, strongly advocated by the administration, and its modification during the present Congress to conform in part to his views are familiar history to all Senators.

His election as President pro tempore of the Senate when the Democrats secured control of the organization in 1913 was an honor which he and the people of our State heartily appreciated. Speaking for the most part to Senators who are familiar with his personality and his services, I deem it not improper to say that this recognition was the tribute of his associates to his unimpeachable integrity and his notable ability, and was in no wise the result of that partiality which sometimes brings unmerited favor to men in public life.

His reelection as President pro tempore of the Senate at a time when his relationship with some of his party colleagues was strained on account of his opposition to the ship-purchase bill, an administration measure, gives emphasis to this view and illustrates his ability to impress his personality upon his associates in spite of the opposition which his course inevitably aroused.

When the Adamson eight-hour bill was voted upon by the Senate Senator Clarke and one other Democrat voted against the measure. He regarded the bill as a direct encroachment upon the freedom of contract and as legislation under improper restraint and influences approximating compulsion. It has been stated that he declined to sign the bill as President pro tempore because of his opposition to it. It is true that he vacated the chair and called the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Hughes] to preside when the bill was received for signature; but I happen to know that his action in this instance was not prompted by his opposition to the measure but by a desire to accord the privilege of signing it to one of his intimate personal friends who had been a strong advocate of the bill and whose whole career in Congress had been signalized by a friendly attitude toward legislation in the interest of labor. There is no mistake in the assertion that he was unalterably opposed to the bill, but his failure to sign it was prompted principally by the sentimental consideration above stated rather than by sheer obstinacy.

The Panama Canal bill, the Bristow amendment, the shippurchase bill, and the eight-hour law are all measures of paramount and far-reaching importance. All forms of political and personal pressure, amounting to almost temporary social and political ostracism, were exerted to induce him to yield in every one of these instances. In no case did he seriously consider modifying his position except with reference to the ship-purchase bill. In that case, if he did not slightly modify his attitude, he was almost persuaded to do so.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

During the last session of Congress, when the Philippine Government bill was under consideration, Senator Clarke offered an amendment providing for independence to the Fillpinos within a short, fixed period. Opposition to the amendment was organized and powerful, and the contest was one of the fiercest which I have observed in Congress during 15 years' service. His amendment, in a modified form, passed the Senate, but was defeated in the House of Representatives. Its defeat was a great disappointment to Senator Clarke, who believed in a prompt grant of independence to the Philippines as necessary to preserve amicable relations with certain oriental powers, and to maintain the honor and good faith of the United States as expressed in its traditional policies, its treaties, the Constitution, and the Declaration of Independence.

These instances illustrate his independent grasp of public questions. They are by no means exhaustive. His views and services were practical rather than theoretical. He never advocated purely idealistic propositions, but invariably justified his course by considerations of justice and the public interest.

DOMINATING SPIRIT.

The impatience with which he encountered opposition, his decisive views and aggressive assertion of them, and his dominating spirit are known to every Senator here. His appeal was to the group rather than to the individual or the multitude. His influence with courts, juries, committees, and like organizations was remarkable, and at times astounding. He was almost indifferent to popular opinion. His freedom from all forms of demagoguery, of which I have already spoken, is illustrated by the fact that he never advertised, never appealed to sympathy.

that the preservation of the Government may in the future depend upon its control of the selection of its officers. He voted for the Bristow amendment and against the Bacon amendment. Unfriendliness toward newspapers and newspaper men marked his entire public career. He rarely granted interviews, never explained through the newspapers, and frequently provoked unfriendly editorial comment by an intolerant manner. Some of the newspapers in our State pursued a persistent policy of antagonizing him and their reporters and correspondents were instructed to "knock" him. He rarely took public notice of unfavorable comments, but freely expressed, in a personal way, his resentment at this treatment.

Had he pursued a different course, had he been considerate of the feelings of newspaper reporters and availed himself, as most public men do, of fair and just opportunities for publicity, his unusual attainments and mental powers would have been more generally known and appreciated.

SOME CLARKE EPIGRAMS.

The power of terse, epigrammatical statement characterized Senator Clarke's utterances. I have memorized a few of his sentences so striking or original as to merit preservation, as follows:

The hate squad in political warfare is always on the firing line, brother; it never sleeps nor goes off duty. It is commanded by disappointed office seekers.

There exists no political friendships; they are merely political alliances,

The ever-increasing details of senatorial labor tend to belittle the office. Under the existing system we exhaust our energy in attention to the trivial and personal requests of our constituents and retain neither the strength nor the disposition to devote ourselves vigorously to the great public issues.

It is not so much the requests of my constituents which I have refused to grant that have plagued and embarrassed my public service as those which I have attempted to grant to the neglect of vital public duties.

No one deserves to be a Senator who shirks responsibility by hiding behind a caucus edict. I am anxious to confer with my colleagues and gladly yield to them in nonessentials, but in matters vital to the Nation's welfare, I must be true to my own convictions.

If the people knew the petty jealousies and the selfishness that animate officialdom, their patriotism might be staggered.

I never placate an enemy.

While every man owes a portion of his time to the public, a poor man is foolish to pursue politics through the earning period of life, and thus approach its end in regret and poverty.

The professional politician, like the professional gambler, always loses the big stake if he plays the game long enough.

One of the important principles of our Government is to minimize the influence of selfishness in its actual administration.

The Constitution is too often invoked to justify as an individual right what the public condemn as a moral wrong.

The traditional devotion of this Government to liberty requires that we pledge a prompt grant of independence to the Philippine people.

Nature compensates in part the loss of power that frequently attends old age by inability to realize approaching senility.

In his last campaign he was exhorted by friends to distribute garden seeds and Government documents as a means of promoting his renomination. In the course of a public speech he said substantially:

I have been told that my candidacy would be more popular if I would send the voters garden seeds and documents. This does not appeal to me as a justification for your favor, but if you view the subject differently you will no doubt be gratified to learn that a carload of Government documents and seed is now on the way to Arkansas. I hope, however, that none of you will be influenced by such means to yote for me.

On another occasion he said:

Complaint is made that I do not answer letters. I receive a great many communications that in no wise relate to my public duties; letters that concern the private wishes of some of my constituents. I have answered every letter which I regarded as worthy of an answer, and I inform you now that if I am reelected to the Senate I shall write fewer letters during the next six years than I have written during the last.

The foregoing are reproduced from memory and are incomplete and inaccurate, but they serve to illustrate and emphasize the unusual character of Senator Clarke's mind and manner.

COURAGE IN THE FACE OF DEATH.

The extraordinary personal courage of this man did not fall him in the face of death. His intimate associates had known for some months before the end that he experienced physical infirmities which occasioned him anxiety. He was aware of the nature of the malady with which he was afflicted—arterioscierosis—and knew that it was incurable. A few months before his death, contemplating the future, he said to me:

If I could call back ten years, I would propose that we retire from politics and form a partnership for the practice of law; but it is now too late for me to make that change. I am facing the wall.

His face assumed the rigidness of marble, and he concluded with this statement:

I shall end my career in the Senate, and it will not continue long. One of the principal ambitions of my life in youth was to become a United States Senator. My only regret is that I have been unable to so control my labors as to apply my energies unreservedly to the great problems with which I have been called to deal.

Three days before his death Senator Clarke was stricken in his office with apoplexy, and while being removed to his home in an automobile a young man of my acquaintance passed him on the street. He was sitting upright between two friends. His demeanor was so complacent and unchanged that, although he was dying and could not speak, the young man, mistaking his fortitude for the manifestation of health and vigor, said to me an hour later: "I saw the senior Senator a little while ago. He looked unusually well." Imagine my feelings when I shortly learned that he was being borne to his deathbed. On the following Sunday about noon, surrounded by his family, he passed resignedly into eternity.

Senator Clarke was endowed with a great mind and possessed an indomitable spirit. His devotion to duty, his adherence to the public interest, and his indifference to censure, which ordinarily deters feeble souls, marked him as an extraordinary man. If he had yielded to the promptings of his generous heart and forgiven the wrongs which his manner invited; if he had cultivated more flowers and planted fewer trees; if he had known more of charity and less of will, his life would doubtless have been happier, but in all probability his public services would have been less fruitful.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the news of the death of Senator CLARKE, which came to us last October with the shock of a surprise, brought to me not only genuine sorrow but a deep sense of personal loss. I never had known Senator Clarke until he entered the Senate, and I shall not attempt to say anything in regard to his career prior to that time, which can be done much better and with a more perfect knowledge by others. I desire merely to give the impression he made upon me during our years together in the Senate. After we first met in this Chamber our acquaintance soon ripened into friendship. Our service upon the Committee on Foreign Relations gave us subjects of a common interest, and this widened to many others, not only those connected with the work of the Senate but to all the matters, great and small, concerning men and things about which friends are wont to talk. Dr. Holmes says that in every one of us there are three men: John as he appears to himself, John as he appears to others, and the real John. But the real man can be discovered, I think, through his acts and words, and through the comparison and combination of the judgments of others. I can only speak of Senator Clarke as he appeared to me, and my opinion and estimate may vary from those of others, but this at least I can say, that my judgment of him was neither casual nor hasty.

When the wise men of Northumbria gathered, some fourteen hundred years ago, to deliberate on the new Christian faith to which their King Eadwine had pledged himself, an aged ealdorman said:

So seems the life of man, O King, as a sparrow's flight through the hall where a man is sitting at meat in wintertide with the warm fire lighted on the hearths but the chill rainstorm without. The sparrow flies in at one door and tarries for a moment in the light and heat of the hearth fire, and then, flying forth from the other, vanishes into the wintry darkness whence it came. So tarries for a moment the life of man in our sight.

To all engaged in active pursuits, still more to those of us in public life, there comes a vision of many men and many faces as we flutter through the warm and lighted hall of life. One blurs into another and they pass like the marching hundreds of a great procession and leave only the impression of multitude behind. In Meissonier's famous picture of the Cuirassiers passing the Emperor at the Battle of Friedland there is an overwhelming sense conveyed of a vast mass of charging cavalry, of men with uplifted sabers shouting the cry of onset, and of crowding horses, wild eyed and with wide, distended nostrils. And yet I believe there are only seven men and horses actually and separately delineated; all the rest is the indication and suggestion of multitude by the art of the painter. So, as we unroll the canvas where life has stored its pictures, we seem to hear in the silence the tones of many voices like the "sounds of water falling," to see with the eyes of the mind a great gathering of men and women; but as we look closer we discern that memory, like the great artist, has, with cunning hand, given an unescapable effect of numbers, and yet that there are only a few clearly drawn and finished portraits in her gallery. We soon learn to realize, if we reflect upon it, that this is one of nature's more kindly forms of selection, and that the counterfeit presentments which she leaves, deep graven upon the tablets of memory, of those whom we have met in life, after the gates of childhood have closed behind us, are not there by accident. matters not whether we have loved or hated the original, the portrait is there because its subject possessed qualities which could neither be blurred by a crowd nor overlooked and disregarded through insignificance.

Senator Clarke was a man who could not be overlooked. might like or dislike him, but it was impossible to disregard him. He had an arresting personality. For my part, I liked him from the first, and as the years passed my feelings changed from liking to affection, and with the affection was mingled much genuine admiration. He was, of course, an able man. His success in life and the offices he held demonstrated his abilities. But there are many men of ability and industry who are not interesting and who lack the character and qualities which command admiration, even if it is accorded with reluctance. Senator Clarke was interesting. That fact I soon discovered, and I was struck very early in our acquaintance with the alertness of his mind and with his keen sense of humor. mind worked with really extraordinary rapidity, and when this quickness of comprehension was found in combination with humor it is hardly necessary to add that he was a sympathetic companion. He talked extremely well, and that which was best about his talk was that it was all his own, for, so far as my observation went, he almost never indulged in anecdote, which he shunned, I think, because the long-drawn story bored him, and he was bored, it seemed to me, rather easily. It is no doubt an amiable trait to suffer bores gladly, but the man who does not do so—and Senator Clarke did not—is pretty certain never to be tiresome himself. Another quality which made him attractive was his intellectual honesty, whether he was dealing with men or events, and he was singularly free, in forming and expressing his opinions, from the prejudices of either locality or environment, which usually mark the village outlook and the parochial mind.

With his intellectual honesty went almost necessarily intelcourage. He never retracted or fell back from his own beliefs or conclusions. His moral courage was on the same plane. I have never seen a man in public life more wholly courageous in all public questions, whether political or other-I do not say this because on several rather conspicuous occasions he voted against his own party. This is not uncommon, and often requires courage, although at times it is due to very different motives and qualities. I have recognized and appreciated his courage when he was against the views I held quite as much as when we were in sympathy. Sometimes it has seemed to me that the position he took was simply perverse, but the courage with which he maintained it was just as clear as in any other case. He never feared to stand alone. lectual or political solitude had for him no terrors, although he was by no means a solitary man and liked and depended upon the society of his friends. He had a hatred of base compliance and of timidity, especially moral timidity, and this led him perhaps at times to extremes and to the occasional apparent perversities of judgment of which I have spoken. But however much one might differ from him, it was impossible not to respect him. By force of intelligence and character he came to a high place in the Senate, and no one ever doubted that he was a man of power with whom it was necessary to reckon. leaves a gap in our public life not easily filled, and has caused a break in the friendship of many of us which will always be remembered with affectionate sorrow.

I have only attempted to give the merest sketch of Senator CLARKE as he appeared to me. It has, I think, at least this merit, that it is entirely true so far as I saw and knew him, and I know that he would have preferred the truth to be spoken. Oliver Cromwell, when Sir Peter Lely proposed to leave out the wart in the portrait, said, "Paint me as I am." This, I am sure, would be Senator Clarke's wish, and this is what I have tried to do, but I am well aware how imperfect any sketch must I have sought only to give an impression of the man and to point out his most salient attributes, but the quality for which Senator Clarke commands especial commemoration, the one for which he should long be remembered, was his complete courage shown in a time and place and in a mode of life where we are not overburdened or oppressed with that high virtue. He had an intellectual courage which never faltered before the conclusions reached by his reason; a moral courage which never shrank from loyalty to his convictions and his sense of duty; a high personal courage to which the fear of any man or any body of men was not only unknown but impossible. It is thus that I have read the character and the qualities, both intellectual and moral, of the friend whose death I so deeply and sincerely

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, we remember many of our public men only because they were successful in politics. of the office, and then, by the association of ideas, figure out who held it at a given time.

Senator Clarke's life was crowded full of political honors. Yet I always think of him first, and of his office afterwards, if at all.

His fame will rest not upon the fact that he was governor and United States Senator, but upon his individuality.

He was well equipped for public life. He had ability; he was industrious; he hated shams; he was mentally honest; he had convictions and the courage thereof.

He was not provincial, but, on the contrary, comprehended the rights and interests of the whole country, as to which he was remarkably well informed. Moreover, he loved his country and its institutions.

If Arkansas honored him, he was an honor to Arkansas. If the Senate honored him, he was an honor to the Senate.

In his death Arkansas has lost a distinguished Senator, the Senate has lost one of its leading Members, and the country has lost a real statesman.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, those who knew Senator Clarke best admired him most, respected him most, and loved Impetuous as Rupert, he was just as dashing, just as brave. The Harry Hotspur of senatorial debate, he was always a Chesterfield in his manners and in his bearing. Possessing a superb mental equipment, he had also that far more rare and precious gift of the gods-an unflinching courage, both physical and moral, that does not leave a man even in the dark hour that immediately precedes the dawn, that makes him a marked man among his fellows, a leader in Israel.

It is not my purpose to speak at length or with detail of Senator Clarke's long and distinguished service in this body. Others who have served with him longer may do so more appropriately. If, however, I may be permitted to summarize in a word the one predominant feature of that service, the crowning virtue of his great public career, I should unhesitatingly say it was "independence"-independence of thought and action, of mind and character. His figure stood out in splendid and startling relief from the drab background of smooth complacency, of easy and frequent surrender of principle and conviction that is so characteristic of modern politics and of modern politicians, the greatest and the boldest and the truest and bravest American Senator of recent times, man of his own mind, captain of his own soul, acknowledging no master save the God he worshipped and the great constituency whose commission he held.

To my mind he was, first, last, and always, the splendid prototype of the Roman Senator in those early days when the glory f the seven-hilled city first began to fill the world, and when chiefest among those glories was the spotless integrity, the profound wisdom, and the lofty patriotism of its Senate.

Senators, we both miss and mourn our erstwhile associate, our late colleague. His dauntless soul has lifted at last the veil that enshrouds immortality, and the secrets of the beyond are bared to his inquiring mind. No tremor of fear ever challenged his manhood in life, and we may be assured that he went unafraid to meet his Maker and his Judge. His great public services have become a part of the heritage of his countrymen, and the memory of his glorious courage remains with us to cheer us and to inspire us when at times the path grows thorny and the feet begin to falter.

May God assoil his soul and may we meet him again in that brighter and fairer land where hypocrisy and cowardice are not and where only the true and the pure in heart keep the altar fires alight.

Senators, I loved him, I miss him, I mourn him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a great lawyer, an eloquent advocate, a fearless defender of his principles, a man of strong likes and dislikes, James P. Clarke belonged to a class of public men who have contributed largely to the advancement of the things that most vitally concern the dignity and welfare of our country. Others will tell of his remarkable achievements as a citizen of Arkansas. It is sufficient for me to say a few simple words as to my knowledge of the man as a Member of this body.

Senator CLARKE entered the Senate March 9, 1903, and died October 1, 1916, shortly after he had been elected to a third term. As a Senator, he was noted for his integrity of character, fearlessness in debate, and independence on the great public questions of the day. Elevated to the high office of President pro tempore of the Senate, he discharged the duties of that position with absolute impartiality. No member of the minority had any reason to fear that he would not be protected in every right that belonged to him or that the rules of the body would not be administered in a most scrupulous manner.

Impatient in speech and militant in manner, Senator CLARKE took a high rank as a debater, demonstrating his great knowledge of the traditions of the Senate and of the fundamental principles of both national and international law.

Senator Clarke, in common with other Members of the Senate who have been here a long time, was a firm believer in free and unlimited debate and vigorously opposed all attempts at cloture, no matter what form they might take. "This is the only tribunal on earth," said he at one time, "where there is unlimited debate, and there is no question of relevancy here except what is designated in the rules."

On another occasion the advocates of cloture attempted to take a long step in the accomplishment of their ends by demanding that a Senator must confine his remarks to the question before the Senate. Senator Clarke was quick to voice his objection to such a course, declaring that if the rule were applied that a Senator must confine his remarks to the proposition which the Senate had before it "it would depopulate the Senate and absolutely doom some of us to eternal silence, if we had to talk directly to questions that are pending." He believed that Senators should be allowed to follow their own methods of debate, and not be required to speak with the knowledge that they might be interrupted at any time by another Senator in whose opinion their remarks were not relevant to the subject under discussion.

As President pro tempore Senator Clarke was confronted with many situations which would have seriously embarrassed a weaker man, but he met them all with courage, and inexorably applied to each case the rules of the Senate as he interpreted them. He was an exponent of the theory that Senators present but not voting should be counted if it was necessary to establish the fact that a quorum was present. He many times, while in the Chair, put that principle into effect, and unhesitatingly announced the presence of a quorum even though it had not been shown by the vote.

Senator Clarke was a close student of public affairs, particularly those involving legal questions. He spent many hours in the Library of the Senate examining the reports of the Federal Courts and the records of previous Congresses for material on which to base his instructive addresses to the Senate, which always commanded the close attention of his colleagues. His death left a gap in the Senate that it is difficult to fill, and he will be missed more and more by those of us who knew the man and appreciated his splendid qualities of heart and mind.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, 35 years elapsed between the time I first knew James P. Clarke as a law student at the University of Virginia and the time we renewed our acquaintance in the Senate of the United States. Clarke was a young man of 24 and I was a boy of 16 when we first became acquainted. He was recognized then at the university as a strong, able, self-willed, determined man. I was a young boy in the academic department, and naturally I felt it a privilege to be acquainted with him and have him take some interest in my welfare. The boys at the university predicted that Clarke's ability would carry him far, and they were not in error.

Those of us who have had strenuous experience in the political field know that a man who serves in his State house of representatives, thence goes into the State senate, becomes attorney general of his State, is chosen by his people as their governor, and then elected to the United States Senate for three terms not only has great ability, determination, and all qualities that go to make up leadership but that he has impressed his work and attainments thoroughly upon those who have the opportunity to know him best—the people back home.

It is doubtless a great satisfaction to a man of Senator Clarke's preeminent ability to have that ability recognized in the wider field of national politics, but when your constituents time and again have shown their high appreciation, as the people of Arkansas did in the case of Senator Clarke, one can have the double satisfaction of knowing that back home, where men are weighed in different scales, the constant support and appreciation shown by them leaves no real terrors for a self-reliant, conscientious representative of the people when, perchance, defeat may come to him, and he returns to pass the remainder of his life among them. Kipling has expressed his thought in a way which seems to me as striking as any I have heard:

Old Nineveh town has nothing to give For the place where a man's own folks still live; He might have been that or he may be this, But they love him and hate him for what he is, I have no doubt from my own knowledge of Senator CLARKE that he had his full share of loves and hates, but I have never known a man who was more absolutely self-reliant, willing to meet any contest forced upon him or which he forced upon his antagonists, and, personally, I can not conceive that in any of the stormy episodes of his career he ever gave or asked quarter. Dispositions differ, so that traits like these may seem admirable or not, but no one fails to admire the man of great ability and courage grappling with whatever questions may be presented, entering fearlessly into whatever conditions he may have to undergo, and throughout it all exhibiting, as Senator CLARKE did, an independence of thought, character, and action which many would be proud to emulate.

Some time before his last reelection Senator CLARKE said to me that he had never been satisfied fully with his career in the Senate, and that he hoped, if reelected, he would be able to devote himself to the larger questions of statesmanship which had been too much in his life interfered with by the urgent claims of practical politics. He said to me that he intended during the balance of his political career to take a more active part in the consideration of questions of wider importance than he had been able to do during his prior terms, and I attribute to this intention the very prominent part he took in the consideration of the Philippine bill, where his proposal of early and certain independence became the storm center of that important measure, around which practically all debate revolved. I approved of Senator Clarke's conception of the right treatment of this matter, and feel sure that this was one of the larger questions affecting the future welfare of our country to which he had given most careful consideration and, as usual, regarding which he reached the right conclusion.

Senator CLARKE's powers did not show any signs of failure; his services in this body ended probably at the height of his intellectual powers. He had become a national figure, and achieved that position through intellectual ability. Those of us who lived here on terms of friendship with him admired and respected him as one of the great figures in this body. His State honored itself and him in the selection, as one of her Senators, of this man of dominant personality, and those of us who knew him well will long hold him in remembrance, in the highest esteem and regard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it has been said that republics have a tendency to make moral cowards of public men. It may be so, but if so, the man to whose memory we pay tribute to-day was a splendid exception to the rule. This tendency did not leave its impress in any way upon his labors here. He was one at least who examined all questions upon their merits and followed without anxiety or apology the course pointed out by an untrammeled conscience and a well-trained mind. Firm in his purposes, fearless in the advocacy of his opinions, he belonged to that splendid breed of men who mold rather than follow public opinion—the only true servants of the people, the real defenders of democracy. Neither prestige, precedents, nor popular outcry disturbed him in the least when once he had made up his mind as to the justice of a cause or the truth concerning the subject in hand. No man had a keener or more accurate scent for the specious and insincere, none more adept and ruthless in striking the mask of patriotism from the face of selfishness and fraud. That confusion of plan, that sudden change of procedure, that drive forward to-day and retreat to-morrow which ever accompanies the course of those who consult expediency rather than truth constituted no part of his public service. He did not belong to that class of modern statesmen whose capacity to discern the drift of popular sentiment has been developed at the expense of the higher and nobler faculty of discerning the sound from the unsound, the temporary from the permanent, or that which satisfies the demands of the day from those great truths which contribute to the permanent happiness and power of a people. His independence was the constant admiration of his colleagues, his moral courage was

We have all often read how at a time when things seemed going against the plan to formulate a constitution and create a government, Washington uttered these words:

It is but too probable that no plan that we can propose will be adopted. Perhaps another terrible conflict is to be sustained. If to please the people we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterwards defend our work? Let us -raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God.

Underneath these words it is not difficult to discern that abiding belief that in the final disposition of things the people will measure up to and approve the best plan that the bravest and best intellects of the age can give, and such a belief is the bedrock foundation upon which the higher faith in popular government is built. These words of Washington ought to be written above every legislative hall in our land. Upon any other principle the Republic will ultimately break down. common mistake which we are all prone to make is in underrating the wisdom and patriotism of the people. They may not always discern in the first instance the wisest and the best, but they never ultimately reject the truth when the truth is pointed out. Those who do not believe that the people are capable of indorsing and approving the wisest laws and sustaining the most efficient institutions which the best minds and bravest hearts can give them do not really catch the true princi-ples of popular government at all. They have been lured into time-serving paths and missed entirely the larger outlines of the great faith. I can pay no higher tribute to our departed colleague than to say that he walked in manly fashion in the light of these principles. He believed that that which was wise would ultimately win, and that though not popular to-day a measure founded in reason and justice would be popular tomorrow. He was willing at all times to wait for vindication in case it was not at hand, and he did not worry about the lateness of its arrival. He believed in the eternal law of right and wrong and by it tested all other laws. If the majority approved he was gratified. If not he was not dismayed. He knew there was something of the reptile in the man who crawls whether at the bidding of a prince or a president, something of the intellectual slave in the man who surrenders his conscience to the control of others, whether to a king or a multitude. In this body James P. Clarke represented himself. The vote he cast was his vote, and yet there were among our membership no truer man to popular government, no firmer advocate of the just and the humane than this self-reliant and upright Senator.

Mr. President, a few years ago one of the most attractive men of the South came up into a northern State and told us of a "new South." No one can forget the thrill of joy which the rich tones of Grady's voice sent to every loyal heart in the land. Old chords were touched by a wizard hand and gave up again the strains of nationality. The music of the Union of the old days when, as Webster tells us, Massachusetts and South Carolina stood about the administration of Washington, drowned for years by the din of civil conflict, rang strong and true again all the way from the plantations of the South to the miner's cabin on the slopes of the western mountains. brilliant Georgian sounded a note sincere and true. I have no doubt that here and there sleeping in southern bosoms may be found something of the old prejudice which some untoward act might arouse; I have no doubt there are still those in the North who are unable, honestly unable to free themselves from the strong feelings engendered by the stress and strain of those terrible days. We neither quarrel with nor criticize those people. But if I mistake not there is not only a new South but a new North-a North which has finally torn from its heart the old feeling of suspicion and hate and which has finally come forward to the place where Lincoln stood at the close of the war, a North which realizes deeply and profoundly that the South more than any other part of the country must deal with that peculiar problem of which no one can think without a tremor of doubt—a North which no longer boasts of being better prepared to deal with this great problem than those upon whom the greater portion of the burden rests. Senator Clarke represented this era of rehabilitation, this period of a truly reunited and disenthralled country. He rose easily, naturally, and without ostentation, above locality, above section, and ofttimes above party. His vision and his purposes included his whole country, his patriotism in scope and sympathy was commensurate with the Nation as a whole. He resented the limitations of prejudice and broke away from all restraints which the past would put upon his truly national spirit.

It would prolong these remarks too far to enter upon a discussion of the details of his service here, his exceptional ability as a lawyer, his wide and most accurate information upon all public questions, the dignified and impartial manner in which he presided over this body. I conclude by saying that he was in every sense a great Senator, an honor to the great State which he so faithfully represented, and commensurate in integrity and ability to the responsibility attaching to his position in the highest legislative body in the country. In these crowded tragic days we do not long reflect about the things that are gone by nor often hark back to our colleagues who have passed on, but everyone who served with him misses from our midst this strong, resolute, indomitable, historic figure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be considered as unanimously adopted.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR SHIVELY.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, in pursuance of the notice heretofore given, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk. The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read. The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Senate resolution 364.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. Benjamin F. Shively, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, when it was announced in the Senate on the afternoon of the 14th of March last that the distinguished senior Senator from Indiana had passed out of life in Providence Hospital in this city but a few moments before, there was sorrow, sincere and profound, on both sides of the Chamber. While all realized the loss of one of their ablest and most honored associates, there were very many Senators who mourned the loss of a friend for whom they entertained feelings of the most affectionate regard.

The sad intelligence was not unexpected here in Washington, for all were familiar with the brave and heroic fight for life he had been making for more than a year, and many had been witnesses to the dreadful suffering he had endured and the matchless fortitude with which he had so long fought the losing battle.

And when the message announcing the end of this honorable and useful life was flashed across the mountains to the great Commonwealth whose Senator he was, the expressions of sorrow were universal, and from the lake to the river there came up from the people—men and women of all parties—the strongest manifestations of their deep appreciation of the splendid services rendered by their great Senator, who for so many years and with such great ability and rare fidelity, had represented them first in one and then the other branch of the National Congress.

He was born in Indiana—born and brought up on an Indiana farm—and until he attained his majority his life was spent in the midst of the good country people of his section, working on the farm in the summer, first attending and then teaching in the common schools in the winter. He knew the nature of their joys and the depth of their sorrows, and by this experience he had first-hand knowledge of the aims and purposes, the needs and desires, the hopes and aspirations of the great body of the people whom he was afterwards to serve with such distinction, and it was this knowledge thus acquired which made of him such an effective champion of popular rights.

He loved his native State and in return her people honored him and ungrudgingly gave to him the highest proof of their confidence and esteem, so that when the end came there was universal sorrow throughout the State for one of her best-loved and most distinguished sons was "gone forever and ever by" and the face and figure so well known of all were never more to be seen amongst men.

Benjamin Franklin Shively was born in St. Joseph County, Ind., on the 20th day of March, 1857. He never resided elsewhere, and his body rests in the soil of his native county within a few miles of the place of his birth.

His father, Rev. Joel Shively, was a minister of the Gospel, his mother a devoted Christian woman, so that he was brought up under the influence and within the environment of a Christian home. His youthful experiences were those of the average farm lad in the Central West, working on the farm in the summer and attending the common schools in the winter until his eighteenth year, when he became a teacher in the schools which he had attended as a pupil, and continued to teach in the winter seasons for several years, until 1880, when he engaged in journalistic work until 1884, in the meanwhile giving some time to the study of law.

His entry into the political field was under circumstances somewhat remarkable. In 1884, the year of the great Cleveland-Blaine campaign, Hon. William H. Calkins, who had represented the South Bend district in Congress for several terms, received the Republican nomination for Governor of Indiana, and resigned his seat in Congress.

For the long term the Democrats of the district had nominated Hon, George Ford, a very able lawyer, of South Bend, now the judge of the superior court of that county. After the resignation of Mr. Calkins, it became necessary to nominate a candidate to fill out his unexpired term. As St. Joseph County was the home of Mr. Ford, already nominated for the long term, the nomination for the short term would in the natural course of politics have been given to a citizen of some other county, for there were several counties in the district, and in all of them were men of such ability and distinction as to have made creditable and formidable candidates. But the attention of many had been attracted by the journalistic work of young Shively, who since his majority had affiliated with the organization known as the Greenback Party—being made up in Indiana of men of character and ability, who believed with many men of both of the old political parties in the quantitative theory of money, and many of whose views as to the proper status of the greenback under the law were afterwards approved and vindicated by the Supreme Court of the United States.

As young Shively's sympathies in the presidential campaign were known to be with Cleveland as against Blaine, and he had shown much ability in his newspaper work, the party leaders concluded that it would be the part of wisdom to enlist his active service in the campaign, and the nomination was tendered him and accepted, and after a brilliant and aggressive canvass he was elected and served out the unexpired term, which ran from December, 1884, until March, 1885. He was the youngest Member of Congress, but by his manly bearing, modest demeanor, and the ability shown in committee and on the floor. he won the confidence and regard of all, and a career of great usefulness was predicted for him by many party leaders.

At the end of this short term he entered the law department of the University of Michigan to continue his preparation for the legal profession and pursued his studies so energetically and successfully that he was graduated with the degree of bachelor of laws during the next year.

The district was normally Republican by a considerable majority, and prior to 1884 had been represented by a Republican for many years; so in 1886 the Republicans resolved to redeem it if possible and named as their congressional candidate their strongest man, Gen. Jasper Packard, a gallant Union soldier, a skilled debater, and seasoned politician.

Mr. Shively's record, during the short term he had served was so satisfactory that he was given the Democratic nomination without opposition. A series of joint debates was arranged, and a most interesting campaign inaugurated. Great crowds greeted the candidates at these joint meetings, and intense interest was manifested. Young Shively more than met the expectations of his friends, and was hailed everywhere as the champion of the young Democracy of the State. Although the Republican State ticket carried the district, he was elected by more than a thousand majority, and his reputation as an orator and debater was firmly established.

He was reelected in 1888 and 1890, and though the unanimous choice of the party in 1892, declined the nomination, that he might engage in the practice of his profession.

It was while serving his third term in Congress that he married Miss Laura Jenks, daughter of Hon George A. Jenks, a distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, who was Solicitor General of the United States during the first Cleveland administration. Three children were born of this union, George J., John J., and Mary M., all of whom are living and giving promise of lives of usefulness. Senator Shively was tenderly devoted to his family and home.

In 1896 the Democratic Party of Indiana, by a well-nigh unanimous vote, gave to Mr. Shively the nomination for governor of the State. It was a most exciting contest. From the time that Bryan made his great convention speech at Chicago, there was not a day that was not full of dramatic interest in the Indiana campaign. Shively was at his best. His oratory was second only to that of Bryan, and under the inspiring leadership of these two young champions of popular rights there was such a rallying of the hosts as has never been witnessed since.

SHIVELY was at the very forefront of the battle every day. Handsome in person, commanding in presence, with rich and resonant voice, and genuine oratory born of deep conviction, he sounded the trumpet call, and the very earth was trembling for weeks beneath the tread of the marching hosts of the people.

He went down in defeat, but it was an honorable, if not glorious, defeat. His splendid leadership was everywhere acknowledged, and he was given the complimentary vote of his party for United States Senator, while it was in the minority, and in 1909, when, for the first time since 1893 it had the opportunity to confer the honor, it nominated and elected him to the position, which he filled so honorably and with such distinguished ability to the hour of his death.

Senator Shively's great ability as an orator was recognized throughout the Union, and in every campaign there were demands for him in all the debatable States, and from New England to the Pacific coast he had been a commanding figure in the field of campaign oratory.

His record in both Houses of Congress was an enviable one. Whether in the committee room, in the executive departments, in legislative work upon the floor, or in the party councils, he was always strong and effective. He rose to membership on the Ways and Means Committee of the House at a time when the tariff question was paramount and became at once conspicuous and influential in shaping the tariff policy of his party, and his addresses in both Houses on that subject were equal to the best ever delivered by any of the great party leaders.

In the Senate he served with great distinction on the Finance Committee and that on Foreign Relations and was chairman of the important and busy Committee on Pensions. During the long illness of Senator STONE he was acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and at a time when questions of great international importance were perplexing the President and the country. He proved himself equal to the great work and commanded the confidence and admiration of the President and Secretary of State, both of whom frequently sought his counsel and prized highly the very important service he rendered them.

I came to the Senate in 1911 without legislative experience and at once sought the advice and aid of my distinguished colleague. He gave me both ungrudgingly and unselfishly, and our relations up to the day of his death were of the most cordial character. He was deeply solicitous that there should be harmony of action between us, and on all important questions we conferred fully, so that, if possible, we might act and vote in agreement. As a result we kept in perfect accord, our only division of opinion being on the literacy test of the immigration bill, and, as we conscientiously differed on this point, there was not the slightest friction.

In the recommendations we were called upon to make for appointments to office he was generous to a fault, and, although we had scores of friends, applicants for the same position, we never had the slightest difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory result.

It was at Senator Shively's suggestion that I was made a member of the Finance Committee of the Senate within two months after I became a Member of this body, and it was on his motion two years later that I was made chairman of the majority conference.

He was a man of great heart and noble impulses, a statesman of profound learning and exalted patriotism, and he has been and will be sadly missed in the councils of the Nation.

He was my friend, and I shall never cease to honor his memory. May he rest in peace.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, Indiana is one of the great States carved out of the "territory northwest of the Ohio It was given a Territorial government in 1800, and became a State in 1816. Barring a few scattered French hamlets, most of the pioneer settlers of Indiana came from two sources, the earliest—and perhaps the greatest number—came from the States south of the Ohio River, and among this class was the family of Abraham Lincoln. This immigration was supplemented by a considerable number from the Eastern and Northeastern States. This double source of immigration led to a slight cleavage on the question of slavery at an early period in the history of the State, for, although the ordinance of 1787 had prohibited the "institution," yet an effort, which had no great strength and soon collapsed, was made for its retention. This double ethnic source from which the population of the State has sprung has no doubt, to some extent, led to the many hot and close political controversies which have prevailed, so that, politically speaking and from a party standpoint, the State has for upward of three-quarters of a century been regarded as a so-called "close State." The result of this political contention, ever recurring, has been to breed from time to time a large number of able statesmen and versatile and eloquent orators in both of the great political parties. The political battles have always been strenuous and acute, and have called for and produced aggressive and militant leaders on both sides. not been much room, as a rule, for such political leaders as are sometimes called "political accidents." To become a political leader in such a State and under such conditions real and substantial ability and energy are required. Mere ancestry or wealth is of little consequence.

The fact that our late colleague, Senator Shively, became one of the leaders of his party in the State of his birth, and the State which he so ably represented in this body, is ample proof of his integrity, his ability, and his qualifications as a leader.

He could not have attained the prominence and leadership that was his without ability of a high order. He was not born in the lap of luxury and had no strong friends at court to give him a start in life. By his own efforts, and without help from outside sources, he managed to secure a fair education, and was admitted to the bar as a practicing lawyer. During his earlier years, while he was engaged in securing his education, he taught school, worked on the farm, and did other strenuous manual labor. Among other work in which he had been engaged in those earlier years, he informed me that during one season he operated a thrashing machine among the farmers of Wabasha County, Minn., and he seemed highly pleased with his experience in that line of activity.

Most of the bright, brainy, and active young men in the State of Indiana naturally turned to politics, and this was the case with Senator Shively. At the early age of 26, in 1883, he was elected a Member of the Forty-eighth Congress and was reelected to the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses. It was my fortune to be an associate of his and to serve with him in the Forty-eighth and Fiftieth Congresses. He was one of the youngest but most active Members of that body. Few Members, if any, were more prominent than he when serving their first term. During that early period of our service we boarded at the same hotel, when I became intimately acquainted with him not only officially but socially, and I found him to be a most genial, warm-hearted, and sympathetic companion.

He was very industrious and attentive to public business, and during the latter part of his service in the House he ranked among the more prominent Members of that body. During the Fifty-first Congress he was a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Indian Affairs, both very important committees; and during the Fifty-second Congress he was a prominent member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

On leaving Congress he resumed the practice of law. But his ability as a political leader and speaker soon brought him again into the political field, and in 1896 he became the candidate of his party for the governorship. While he failed to be elected, he nevertheless polled his full party vote. After an interregnum of 13 years, during which time he was busy in his profession as a lawyer, though not inactive in politics, his party in 1909 elected him a Member of the Senate, and in 1914 reelected him for a second term of six years, but it was not his fate to be permitted to serve out his second term. He passed away from this life, after a lingering illness, on the 14th day of March, 1916, during the early part of the first month of the second year of his last term, in the 58th year of his age, mourned and missed by his family, his State, his party, and his associates in this body.

Senator Shively was a member of many of the important committees of this body, the most notable of which were the Committees on Finance, Foreign Relations, and Pensions. He was chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and the next in rank to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and occasionally acted as chairman of that committee. His service in the Senate was marked by the same industry and energy that had characterized him in the House of Representatives. He was serious, conscientious, painstaking, and thorough in his work and was a disbeliever in mere perfunctory service. While not an orator in the common acceptation of the term, he was nevertheless a good and ready debater, who could give and take blows.

While it was not my privilege to hear him on the stump, from what I know of him I can well imagine that he was a strong and effective campaign speaker, whose words, coming from an honest and sincere heart and delivered without any flourish or blare, went home to the heads and hearts of his hearers. It is the man back of the word that makes the word effective and impressive. It seemed to me as though his early struggles had given a color and tone to the entire make-up of his life. There was something intensely human and sympathetic about him. Here in the Senate, as among his neighbors at home, he was always the plain, bluff Ben Shively, without any frills and without an eye on the reporters' gallery. He seemed to be as proud of the fact that he had once run a thrashing machine in Minnesota as of the fact that he was one of the political leaders of his State and a prominent Member of this body.

He was a man of high character, honest, fearless, and brave—a man in whom his party had implicit confidence, and a man whom we all could trust. "Ben Shively's" word was current and good among all who knew him, here and in Indiana. That State has furnished our country with a number of great statesmen, ranking with the foremost in the entire Nation. While the deceased Senator could not perhaps be rated with the foremost of these, he was, nevertheless, near them, and as near the heart of the people of his State as any of them, typical of the brawn and brain, the soul and the heart, of the great body of the people of his State. Friend and brother, we bid thee a sorrowful and final farewell!

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my affection for Benjamin F. Shively was so deep and personal and my bereavement at his sad, untimely end is so poignant that I would prefer to sit silent to-day. I say this because when I stand at the grave of one I loved and whose memory is very dear to me mere words become as sounding brass, empty and comfortless. At such a time, except for the hope we have about things shadowed in the mysteries of the great beyond, there is little in speech to soothe or inspire. True, this beautiful hope to which we cling does soften the blow, and there is inspiration in the example of a great life, but the profound regret which grips the heart goes on to the end with little surcease of sorrow. When I stand in the présence of beloved dead my heart calls more for meditation and the tribute of silence than for public utterance. And yet, in the circumstances of this ceremony I feel constrained to join with others here and speak a gentle word or two about my friend who is gone.

Mr. Shively was a man of high ideals. There was nothing even small, much less mean, about him. He was incapable of littleness. He was kindly, but firm; genial, but not fulsome; frank, but reserved; loyal, but not boastful; clean in mind and heart, but human and considerate; fearless as any knight who ever poised a spear, yet gentle as a woman; intellectual in a high degree, endowed with great powers of analysis and with comprehensive mental scope, he was modest and unpretentious. In the full vigor of his strength, before the wasting came, he stood as a king among men and made a superb and pleasing picture to look upon. I shall not say that we may not see his like again, but this I do say, that all in all there never lived a more manly man.

His public life, although cut short by fate with seeming cruelty, covered many years of distinguished service. He was a marvel of studious industry and profoundly conscientious in all he did. When he was at the helm we knew the pilot was fit to steer the ship. His work will stand as a shining monument to his fine intellect, his patient toil, and his stainless patriotism.

But he is gone. Never again will we feel the pressure of his hand or behold the flash of his eye or the smile upon his lips. He has gone from the transitory scenes of mortal life into a sphere of nobler activities. He has trod the unlit path that most men dread and passed on through the gateway leading into the light beyond. Of one thing I am sure—that no man ever entered upon this starless pathway with braver heart, and few have better deserved the welcoming song of the Angelic Choir as they stepped from the darkness into the sweet sunshine of the eternal Summer Land. And thus I part from dear "Old Ben" with this salutation—Hall and farewell!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to all those who enjoyed the privilege of knowing the late Benjamin F. Shively, a Senator from the great State of Indiana, the best tribute to his memory is an unblemished narrative faithfully describing his rare qualities of character and intellect, as has been done so splendidly by the speakers preceding me. They have portrayed him as he was in life; yet his own works speak more eloquently for him than words of mine can do. I served with him for a number of years on the Committee on Pensions of the Senate and learned of his sympathy and friendship for all those who offered their lives for the preservation of the Union. He never failed to speak or vote for a proper recognition by the Government of the services of the veterans of the Civil War.

His eloquence, his energy, his personal magnetism, and honesty made him a leading and interesting figure upon this floor. To my mind, the most marked characteristic of this worthy man may be summed up in the simple expression, "He was an honest man." By honesty I mean more than a sense of obligation designated as commercial honor; I mean more than a mere sense of duty to obey law and to discharge legal obligations. That is superficial honesty; that is honesty which springs of policy, and may be forced by intellectual recognition of its advantages. Real honesty is a gift of God worked out in those infinite processes which compose the law of heredity, and under all circumstances, under all environments they will work out true results. Benjamin F. Shiyelix was a man of such honesty; a man inherently honest, as every man who knew him must testify to. In his public life no person would have dared by any form of allurement even in the remotest degree to attempt to influence him in the discharge of his public service.

He was called to the beyond in the prime of life, leaving many dear friends who were grieved by the loss of one of the best and most loyal friends, one of the most genial of our distinguished public men. He left to his family more than a princely fortune could bring, because he left behind what all right-thinking men must admit was a successful life, such as thousands of American boys compelled to rely upon their own resources can look to as a model and demonstrating the fact that fortune and business success are open to all in this our beloved America, and may be achieved without wronging a single soul.

Our hearts go out in sympathy to the immediate family and relatives of the late Senator. May the Lord be their comfort! It is but natural that they should feel the pangs of parting; yet there is solace in the knowledge that he was a child of God and that though he has passed out of view for a short time he still lives and is but waiting for his loved ones to rejoin him under more favorable conditions. Let us rejoice in the thought thus expressed by a poet:

There is no death! The heavens may fall, The flowers fade and pass away, They only wait through wintry hours The coming of the May.

There is no death! An angel form Walks o'er the earth with silent tread, He bears our best loved ones away, And then we call them "dead."

Born into that undying life, They leave us but to come again. With joy we welcome them the same, Except in sin and pain.

And ever near us, though unseen The dear immortal spirits tread, or all the boundless universe Is life—there are no dead.

There is no greater tribute I can pay him than to remind those who loved him that he was an affectionate father, a devoted husband, a faithful friend, a fearless and conscientious public servant. In short, a remarkable national character and a good man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, for one reason, at any rate, I would prefer to have gone to that "bourn whence no traveler returns" before Senator SHIYELY went. I would have had a nobler eulogist in him than he has in me.

I shall speak to-day only of the salient and essentially chief character-making element that went to the make-up of the man.

This prevailing characteristic was utter personal unselfishness. He loved honor much, honors somewhat, money not at all. He dwelt, in thought, less upon his private affairs than upon the public business—the res publica, the Republic. It was his thought, his study, his conversation, almost his life. This unselfishness kept his purse empty, but it made his character noble, and kept him unstained in motive.

If he did not "love his enemies"-a hard saying of the gentle Nazarene—he at least loved his friends and served them better than he loved and served himself.

It was said of the French noblesse of the ancien régime that they had proved in a thousand ways and in a thousand places that they "knew how to die like gentlemen," but never that they "knew how to live like men." BEN SHIVELY proved that he knew how to do both-he did both.

From that part of the duration of things which we call Time, and in which we live here, many loving hands are extended unavailingly to him where he stands in that other part of it, unavailingly to him where he stands in that other part of it, known as Eternity—my own hand—I, sorrowing, among them.

Some day he and the other friends who have "crossed over the river" will beckon us over, and we, obeying their call, with vague dread of things unseen and therefore unknown, will go; and the handclasps will come, the spirit of them to endure forever.

Until then may the grace of God make us more like him in this—that we may be less selfish, live and think less self-centered, and be therefore better fitted to invoke, in a spirit resigned to life and death alike, the final blessing upon him of the Church Universal. Requiescat in pace.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, it is greatly to be regretted that the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. Smith], who was to have delivered an address on this occasion, is by reason of ill health prevented from taking part in these exercises.

The bond of friendship which attached Senators Smith and SHIVELY to each other was as strong as that which bound Damon to Pythias, or Jonathan to David. It had existed for more than a quarter of a century and increased in strength as the years passed by, so that when Senator Shively died the away. His regret at not being able to be here to-day, to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of his dead friend, is only equaled by that of his fellow Senators, who know of the intimate personal relations to which I have referred.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have not committed to paper any remarks for this occasion, because my observations will be personal rather than general.

The traits and characteristics of this noble son of Indiana have been so clearly set forth by those who have preceded me that but for the fact that I am his successor I should wholly refrain from speech on this occasion.

Mr. President, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Stone] so feelingly said but a few moments ago, "Senator Shively is gone." We all realize the full significance of this fact. We know that our pleasing words do not reach his waiting ears; we know that he is as far beyond the reach of our short arms as are the stars that shine above us in the sky at night; we know that he sleeps now in the cold and narrow house, indifferent alike to the careless shallows and the tragic deeps of human life; and therefore it is for the living and not the dead that these exercises are of surpassing moment.

At his bier all tongues were silent, save those of praise; all lips were mute, save those of love; that were sufficient eulogy for his gentle soul; and unless by reciting the traits of character he so splendidly exemplified and which we so highly praise wherever manifested, we ourselves are impressed with the necessity of embodying those same virtues in our lives and characters, then these exercises are but sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

Born, as the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. Kern] has said, in 1857, he was 8 years old at the close of the Civil War; hence the fierceness of that great strife must have impressed itself upon his plastic mind. I am led to this belief because Senator Shively was a natural politician. He had great aptitude for the discussion of public questions and an uncommon desire to engage in public debate. This inclination was doubtless greatly increased by reason of the long struggle over reconstruction that followed the Civil War. His boyhood was lived in that atmosphere, and his young manhood was developed under these conditions. First in the common school, then in the college at Valparaiso, then as a school-teacher, and afterwards in the law school at Ann Arbor, he constantly developed the natural tendency of his mind for public debate, until even in those earlier days he became a master of forensic speech.

well recall the first time I ever heard of him. I was in college, and it was in 1884. Maj. William H. Calkins was nominated that year by the Republican Party for the governorship of Indiana. Being at that time a Member of the other branch of Congress, his nomination created a vacancy. Mr. Shively, then but 26 years of age, or only one year over the required constitutional limit, was nominated by the Democrats as their candidate in the succeeding contest. He conducted that campaign with such skill, such ability, and such assiduity and displayed such remarkable characteristics as a debater and a public speaker that he won in that memorable contest, although the district was normally Republican, and I can well remember that the victory achieved under those circumstances presaged the overthrow of the Republican Party at the final election.

He was reelected to the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses; and although he entered that body at the age of 26, he took a leading part from the beginning, and an examination of the Record will disclose that Representative Shively was prominent in all the debates relating to the protective tariff system and the Reed rules, which were then for the first time being practiced by the House. It was in this body that he made for himself a reputation as a tariff debater and a foremost champion of free trade, and I believe him to be the ablest exponent of that doctrine that Indiana has produced for many

In 1892 he declined a renomination, although unanimously tendered him, and, as he afterwards said to me, "because of the irksomeness of the task of being a Member of Congress" "because it destroyed systematic reading," for if there was anything of which Senator Shively was passionately fond it was systematic reading. He was by nature a scholar. He roamed at large in all the fields of literature; he plucked its choicest flowers, and in the ample recesses of his memory stored them away to bring them forth on future occasions to please and charm, for he was ever an omniverous reader.

But his people were not content to permit him to remain in quietude, and in 1896 brought him forth to become the candidate of his party for the governorship of Indiana. Being myself in Congress at that time, I remember that I heard him with great grief of Senator Smith was as if his own brother had passed interest in that campaign. He was a superb man physically, with a splendid head, well poised on broad shoulders. He was blessed with a resonant and resounding voice, rich and mellifluous. He had an ample vocabulary not only of Anglo-Saxon words but also of Latin derivatives, and the cogency of his thought, clothed in beautiful language, made him a most formidable antagonist in any campaign.

I recall that in 1896, in advocating the free-silver doctrine of that year, he was, in my judgment, as Senator Kern has so well said, the foremost champion in the State of Indiana of that cause. He was defeated in that campaign, but defeat did not dishearten him. In fact, no contingency ever appalled him, for he was a man not only of titanic mold but of indomitable will, and I did not know him to be discouraged at any time, even in the midst of failing health and waning power.

In 1903 he was the caucus nominee of his party in the legislature for the United States senatorship, being pitted in that contest against Senator Albert J. Beveridge, then a candidate for reelection. In 1905 he was again the caucus nominee of the Democratic Party for the senatorship, that race being against Charles Warren Fairbanks, then a candidate for reelection. In both of these contests he was beaten, but his consent to become a candidate showed first his fealty to his party, and secondly, his willingness to sacrifice himself even in a fruitless

In 1909 he was elected to the United States Senate. Of his service here you have already heard, and all of you are more familiar with it than am I, and of it I shall not speak.

My intimate acquaintance with Senator Shively began when I was elected a member of the board of trustees of the State University of Indiana, of which body he was president for many years. For six years I retained membership, afterwards resigning because of the pressure of other duties, but in that six years I learned to know the man intimately, to take his intellectual and moral measure, to assess his real value, and it was at that time that I came to the conclusion that he was indeed a masterful man, intellectually and morally-a man of the loftiest ideals, a man of the purest life, a man of the finest and most enviable traits of character. I have known him on many an occasion to read through the night propped up in bed. He was a passionate lover of history and of fiction and of poetry, and many nights down in the university town of Bloomington I have sat with him and discussed all the questions that men discuss on occasions of that character. He was a most interesting conversationalist; he told a story well and liked one; and yet his conversation was not by any means of a frivolous nature, except on rare occasions when men drop into the frivolous naturally, but his talk was rather of politics and of political opinions and of the movement of nations and the true ideals of life.

The one thing which always impressed me as being Senator SHIVELY'S dominant idea in the realm of politics was his firm belief in the equality of men. He never wavered in his ad-herence to the fundamental doctrine of the Declaration of Independence, that all men were created equal, and he was never so eloquent and never so powerful as when he was expounding that doctrine to the people or even to an individual. The finest speech I ever heard him make was on the occasion of the celebration of a great fraternal order. It was there that he connected in a marked manner the material interests of life with the sentiments that warm the heart and exalt the soul, and showed that the man, intellectually and morally, was a type of orator and of statesman that might well be envied by any

So he lived and so he died. On only one occasion, as I recall, was there any conversation between us about the future, but I remember that at one time, along about the midnight hour, while he was in waning health, he said to me, "What is the difference what becomes of any one man? We come here, play our little part on the stage, and pass away, and that is all." I said to him, "But is that all?" And I vividly remember that he turned to me and said, "Well, if I did not believe in a future, or, rather, in a continued existence, I should be of all men most miserable."

Thus he lived in that hope of another world, and he died in the belief of immortality; and well may we say on this occasion, my friends, that Senator Shively's life was a model for any young man desiring to come into success in our American Republic, for the elements so mixed in him that all the world might stand up and say of him, "Intellectually and morally, this was a man."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions heretofore presented by the Senator from Indiana will be unanimously adopted.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR BURLEIGH.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, in pursuance of the notice heretofore given, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Senate resolution 365.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. Edwin C. Burleigh, late a Senator from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, Hon. EDWIN CHICK Burleigh was born in Linneus, Me., November 27, 1843. His parents were Parker Prescott and Caroline Chick Burleigh. grandfather, Moses Burleigh, moved from Sandwich, N. H., to Palermo, Me., in the early part of the nineteenth century, and in 1830, moved from Palermo to Linneus, Me. He was a prominent man in his section and a lieutenant colonel of the militia. In the War of 1812 he was captain of a militia company and represented his district in the Massachusetts general court and in the Maine legislature.

The father of Senator Burleigh, Parker Prescott Burleigh, was born at Palermo, May 16, 1812. He was a farmer and land surveyor, and held many town offices, was a member of the Maine House of Representatives for two terms and of the Maine Senate for four terms, and in 1868 was elected State land agent.

Edwin C. Burleigh was educated in the public schools and in Houlton Academy, where he took the college preparatory course but he early became interested in his father's calling of surveying, and instead of carrying out his purpose of entering college, he studied surveying, assisting himself while pursuing his studies by teaching school,

At the call for troops in 1861 he enlisted in the District of Columbia Cavalry, but was rejected by the examining surgeon, and entered the adjutant general's office at Augusta, Me., as a clerk, which position he filled until the close of the war. then followed the occupation of land surveying, and in 1876, 1877, and 1878 was State land agent, and during the same years assistant clerk of the house of representatives. In 1880 he was appointed clerk in the State treasurer's office, elected State treasurer in 1885, and governor of his State in 1888, and reelected in 1890.

He was elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress from the third Maine district, and was reelected to the Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, Sixtieth, and Sixty-first Con-He was elected United States Senator by the Maine Legislature January 15, 1913, for the term beginning March 4, 1913, and died at Augusta, Me., June 16, 1916.

A mere recital of the many offices of trust held by Senator Burleigh proves conclusively that he held the entire confidence of the people of his State, and the record is in itself a sufficient tribute to his worth and the high character of his public service.

Mr. Burleigh was a man of great industry, who believed in the efficacy of hard work, and no one among the many illustrious men whom Maine has honored has accomplished more by wisely taking advantage of every opportunity presented for advancement, and every office that he filled he did so to the satisfaction of the people of his State.

No man knew the needs of his State better than he and no

No man knew the needs of his state better than he and no man gave more generously of his services and his abilities for her upbuilding. In the minor positions of trust which he held he was an industrious, efficient, trustworthy official, and won the commendation of all with whom he came in contact.

He had the faculty of making friends and attaching them to him with bonds so strong that they were securely held. His manner was most courteous and sympathetic, and no man ever enjoyed doing a kindness for another more than he or derived greater satisfaction from such acts.

As a result, at the very beginning of his public career he had loyal, earnest friends, whose attachment to him and interest in his advancement were remarkable. He had all the qualities of a good business man and was perfectly upright in all his transactions, and his word, when once given, could be absolutely relied upon. In his conduct of the offices of State treasurer and governor these same business qualifications displayed themselves and largely increased the regard which the people of his State had for him.

He was not gifted with extraordinary brilliancy nor possessed of genius, but he used faithfully, persistently, and honestly the abilities with which he was endowed. His administration of the State as governor was marked by his careful attention to all details, and, as he was most democratic in his manner, approachable, and sympathetic, the people of Maine found in him a public servant whose doors were always open and to whom the most humble could apply.

Under his administration an attempt was made to remove the capital of the State from Augusta to Portland, which he strongly resisted with success. A large appropriation was made for the enlargement of the statehouse, and he was made the chairman of the commission which gave to Maine a finely equipped and commodious State capitol.

His attention was attracted to the needs of the militia of Maine; and he advocated and, by the influence of his great office, obtained the purchase of a permanent militia ground in the capital of the State, where the citizen soldiery could meet once a year.

He observed the needs of the State for larger accommodations for the unfortunate insane and strenuously advocated the building of another asylum for them in the eastern part of the State, and as a result of his efforts the Eastern Maine Hospital for the Insane, at Bangor, was established.

It had become apparent that there was a great discrepancy between the valuation of property in our State for the purposes of State taxation and the valuation placed upon it by agents of the Federal Government. He therefore advocated the creation of a valuation commission, which should study the question of valuation in the State of Maine, and strongly advocated the appointment of a board of State assessors, which should take under consideration values in the State and report to the State legislature the results of their investigation. He strongly advocated the passage of the Australian ballot system, although many in his party opposed it.

During his administration as governor, by his wise business administration, the public debt of Maine, which had borne interest at 6 per cent, was refunded at 3 per cent and a large saving made to the taxpayers of Maine. His mind was alert and filled with the sense of his obligation to the people who had intrusted him with the responsible position, and his conduct of the affairs of his State with which he, as the supreme executive of the State, was connected was entirely satisfactory to her citizens.

He was always a sincere friend to the old soldier, and under his administration as governor the ap ropriations of the State for their relief were increased to nearly twice their previous amount.

His administration of the various "tate offices to which he had been appointed and elected so inspired his people with confidence in his integrity and ability, and they had become so attached to his democratic manners and careful attention to their varying needs, that the people of his district, although ably represented in Congress, called for his candidacy for the nomination for Congress in 1892. He was defeated in this contest but gave loyal support to the nominee, Hon, Seth L. Milliken.

His loyal support of Mr. Milliken after this heated controversy won for him the commendation of the members of his party, and at Mr. Milliken's death, in 1897, he was nominated and elected as his successor. He was now chosen to represent the district so singularly represented by Mr. Blaine for many years, the old third Maine district. He had won his way by hard work, loyal support of its friends, and a clean public record.

He came to Washington a man but little past middle life, of splendid physique, and unlimited capacity for work. He was not an orator, but he gave his great energy and his unlimited capacity for work to the service of his constituents. Maine had had many brilliant men to serve her in the Halls of Congress, but never one who surpassed Senator Burleigh in his capacity for work and in his desire to serve the humblest of his constituents.

I think he gained greater satisfaction from being of service to one of his constituents than the recipient ever experienced in the enjoyment of what was obtained for him. He assiduously cultivated his acquaintance with all of his constituents and encouraged their frequent communication with him. As a result he had most firmly the attachment of all the members of his party in his district, and by his broad generosity he had attached to himself the support of many of his opponents.

And thus, through a long congressional career, which began

And thus, through a long congressional career, which began in 1897 and did not end until the close of the Sixty-first Congress, on March 4, 1911, he held the people of his district in most loyal support, not by the brilliancy of his career, but by his honest, earnest, and sincere attachment to their interests.

In 1910 he suffered the first defeat he ever experienced at the polls; but it came when his party in Maine met, the first time since 1880, a defeat in their State election. The result was not a defeat of himself individually, but it was a defeat of the whole party; and as a loyal member of it he went down with it. None of his friends, and very few of his opponents, expected his defeat; but under the form of ballot which Maine had adopted, party defeat meant individual defeat.

He had to such a degree won the confidence of his party in the State that when it became necessary to nominate in the State-wide primary for the first time a candidate for the United States Senate, in 1912, he won easily in the contest, although opposed by men of great attainments; one of them an exjustice of the supreme court of his State and the other a lawyer whose great ability as an eloquent advocate and also as a man of broad sympathies and the highest intellectual development had marked him as one of the leaders of thought and directors of public opinion in the State.

Having won his nomination for the Senate, he entered with his usual vigor upon the conduct of his campaign, directing his efforts to carrying the close congressional districts of his State. He was successful; and although the legislature which was elected was, in its political complexion, the closest in the history of the State, he won the election to a seat in this body by the narrow margin of one vote.

The energy and persistency with which he conducted his candidacy for his election have never been equaled in a political contest in the State, and without the supreme loyalty of most sincere friends, he could not have been elected.

He came to the Senate a sick man. The great contest through which he had passed had paralyzed his magnificent bodily energies, for he had given to his candidacy the best that was in him, and nature must have her way. Of this he had thought little, because in his spiendid equipment he had known nothing of disease or of sickness. Work had been his pastime; success had been his reward.

I saw him when he came to take his oath of office in 1913. My acquaintance with him had been limited, although my home from birth had been only 20 miles from the capital where he had long resided, but I had been a lawyer, devoted to my profession, and of another political faith. Consequently we had not been brought in contact with each other, but I saw him close to when he had come with his devoted wife and daughters, who so affectionately followed his footsteps, to take upon himself his oath of office in this Chamber.

I gladly went to him when I learned of his presence in this city, and found him in intense suffering. He had come here feeling that he must be present to have the oath of office administered to him at the commencement of his term on March 4, 1913, and had arranged to submit to a surgical operation as soon as he had received his oath.

My first acquaintance began with him then, when he lay upon his bed of sickness, but the first hand grasp between us disclosed that we had an intimate bond of connection. I admired his courage, his high sense of public duty, and his determination in spite of physical disease to discharge the duties which he believed he had assumed. I attempted to make easy for him the assumption of these duties, and I never received greater satisfaction in my public life than I did from his sincere acknowledgment of his gratification at what he termed my courtesy.

He went from the Senate Chamber, after taking his oath, to a bed of sickness and pain and hovered between life and death for several weeks, cared for by his devoted and loving wife. I heard from him often, and when he rallied and was able to leave the hospital where he had been treated the people of my State rejoiced that one who had served them so faithfully and long had been restored to their service.

He came back to assume his duties here, but disease and inexorable fate had placed their stamp upon him. With indomitable courage and a high sense of duty he attempted to discharge what his conscientious regard for service had always taught him, that there should be a return for what was rendered him. I grew to have a most affectionate regard for him as I observed his fine traits of character, the breadth of his mind, and his consideration for others, including myself.

mind, and his consideration for others, including myself.

His service here was too short for Senators to learn his lovable disposition, his ability for public service, and his loyal devotion to the interests of his country. Fate had made me his senior in this Chamber although I was inexperienced as compared with his larger participation in public affairs, but he most readily accorded me full support in all measures which concerned our State.

That energy and physical health which had enabled him to be of such important service to his State while a Member of the lower House of Congress, had failed him, but his desire to be of service, his loyalty to his State, and his interest in the welfare of both State and Nation, were still the guiding, controlling influences of his life.

Thus I saw him and grew to love him and I believe that my affection was reciprocated. I come now to pay the honest tribute of a sincere friend who has had an opportunity to see the inner life of a conscientious public servant.

No tribute to Senator Burleigh would be complete without mentioning that supreme test of a man's life—the verdict rendered upon him in his home, and among those bound to him by ties of blood. He was most fortunate in having chosen as his companion for life a woman of remarkable energy, strength of character, and traits which go to make up the wife and mother. In her, nature had joined all these, and she was to him a helpmeet indeed.

Her great intellectual ability supplemented his, and together they fought the battle of life on fully equal terms, and if ever man had reason to thank neaven for having blessed him with a loyal wife, Senator Burleigh was under that obligation. She entered with him into all his political contests and with the acumen of a woman's judgment, weighed every political exigency. She was a true wife. Her heart was with her exigency. husband and with him it went with a loyal, loving devotion that sustained and strengthened him in every contest. She was of the best type of our New England-women, reliant, strong, trustworthy, and loyal, and to a great measure his success was due to her ennobling influence.

The sons and daughters who grew up about them were splendid examples of New England's civilization. It has been my good fortune to know them all and to know that the heritage that they received from an honorable father and a loving mother has been most meritoriously preserved.

Senator Burleigh had achieved success in the political arena and in business life as well. He bore upon himself the honors of an old State, conservative in her grants of favor. About him he had gathered, by his industry and his business sagacity the fruits from a long life with troops of friends, the loving, affectionate services of a dear companion, and the most fillal regard of sons and daughters, whose children looked to him for endearing phrase and were ever the subject of his tender solicitation. Life had brought him in abundance of her treasures, and when he seemed most ready to enjoy them the inexorable call of fate called him, as it will each of us, to sever every

The wife who had been the companion at his side, who had planned with him, who had rejoiced with him at his successes, and who at his defeat had soothed him with her assurances of a deep regard was called from his side, and when that summons came I knew the end was not far off for him, because nature had so linked their lives together that one could not long survive the other.

He did not long survive her death, but dwelling in the gloom with gathering darkness over him death came to him on June 16, 1916, but a short time after that of his wife. We laid him at rest in the capital of our State, where he had so many friends, beside her broad, rolling Kennebec, in the city he loved, and near the capitol, the scene of so many political contests in which he was concerned. There came to mourn his loss not only the high and influential but I marked those of lowly position and reverent mien, who came to show their devotion and to express their loss.

His was a grand character, not because it rose in mountain peaks, upon which the eye rested, but rather because it was that of the undulating plain, steadfast and serene. He satisfied most because on the plain most dwell; on the mountain peak the idealist's vision rests. He was for the practical, the everyday, which brings into common life something that touches neighbor and friend and as such he bore an abundant harvest.

Maine has had men of genius showered in great abundance upon her but never one who brought more of the sunlight into the home of the common, every day citizen and was more a friend to him in want, or did more to meet the demands upon him as friend, neighbor, and constituent, than Senator Bur-

In his long life, devoted to the public service, beginning with the boy of 18 years of age, to the close of his service as United States Senator in the 73d year of his life, through all the various offices of trust to which he had been elected and in which he had so faithfully served the people of his State, not one stain remains upon that official record. It is clean and does not now, and never will, need a defender.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, Edwin Chick Burleigh was my friend, and I loved him as a brother. He was a man of acknowledged ability, of the highest order of integrity, and the personification of kindliness and courtesy. He was one of the most delightful of companions, and a man who could be relied upon at all times to do the just and honorable thing. attachment to him was so deep and sincere that his death came to me in the nature of a personal bereavement. In thinking of him and his rare qualities the lines of James Whitcomb Riley are recalled, as they illustrate the feeling I had toward him:

And so it is you cheer me,
My old friend,
For to know you and be near you,
My old friend.
Makes my hope of clearer light,
And my faith of surer sight,
And my soul a purer white,
My old friend.

Mr. Burleigh had made a great reputation in his State before engaging in the public service. He was a business man of large activities, owner and editor of an influential newspaper, and governor of his State for three years. In every position to which he was called he discharged his duties with rare fidelity, becoming one of the most popular and influential men in the State of Maine.

Mr. Burleigh entered the National House of Representatives in the Fifty-fifth Congress, having been chosen at a special election held June 21, 1897, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Seth C. Milliken, and he immediately was recoginzed by his associates as a strong and useful member of that body.

His first speech in the House was a eulogy on the life and character of Mr. Milliken, his predecessor. In that eulogy Mr.

BURLEIGH said:

I am fully conscious of the inadequacy of mere words, in time of deep bereavement, to voice the sentiments of the heart and speak the language of sorrow.

And in those few words Mr. Burleigh expressed the feelings that those of us who knew him well feel to-day.

Mr. Burleigh was an engaging speaker, quick in repartee, but he was a man-Whose wit in the combat, as gentle as bright, Ne'er carried a heart-stain away on its blade. His eulogy on Mr. Milliken closed with this quotation:

THE DEATH CHANGE COMES.

Death is another life. We bow our heads At going out, we think, and enter straight Another golden chamber of the King's, Larger than this we leave, and lovelier. And then in shadowy glimpses, disconnected, The story, flowerlike, closes thus its leaves. The will of God is all in all. He makes, Destroys, remakes, for His own pleasure all.

On June 15, 1898, Mr. Burleigh made a strong speech in favor of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, saying that "Such a move will establish an ocean fortress for the protection of the great and growing interests of our Pacific coast, and bring nothing but benefits to the American people."

January 5, 1901, Mr. BURLEIGH made a notable speech on the apportionment bill then pending, in which he advocated an adequate representation "to keep pace in some degree with the growth of the country in population and material resources."

After being in the House of Representatives for about 13 ears Mr. Burleigh became a Member of the Senate on March 4, 1913, and after a service covering a period of a little over three years he died June 16, 1916. He served on important committees, and nothwithstanding his health was greatly impaired during his entire service in the Senate he was faithful in committee work and attentive to his duties on the floor. He was a favorite on both sides of the Chamber, his affability and kindness of heart gaining him the good will and friendly regard of all with whom he came in contact.

Mr. President, if it be true that the tomb is but the gateway to an eternity of opportunity, we can well believe that our friend, the late Senator from Maine, freed from the shackles that beset us in this life, with greater opportunities and an enlarged vision is still engaged in shedding light and happiness upon those around him. He acted well his part in life, and is doubtless receiving the reward that comes to those who deserve the appellation of "Well done, good and faithful servant." Of him it may well be said, in the words of a Massachusetts poet:

So when a great man dies, For years beyond our ken, The light he leaves behind him lies Upon the paths of men.

Senator Burleigh is gone, but the memory of his good deeds should be an inspiration and a help to those of us who are left behind. Let us emulate his virtues, and endeavor to meet all the vicissitudes of life with the same philosophical calmness and lofty purposes which characterized our late associate and friend.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I come to pay a simple, heartfelt tribute to my friend, whose memory is an inspiration and a benediction to me. The world may have forgotten him. It soon forgets if it ever remembers us. It keeps in mind only those great figures which spring from some great cataclysm or epoch-making event and tower above the landscape of the This, howworld's progress with centuries rolling between. ever, will not discourage anyone who looks upon life from the viewpoint of humanity. We may not command the world's attention through the centuries, but we can live in grateful remembrance in some human heart long after our bodies are dust and our spirits have passed to the great beyond.

There are events in our lives that make lasting impress upon mind and heart. Their memory lasts through the years and become sweeter as the days go by. They may seem small in themselves and yet be priceless in their effects. They make us better men and life more worth living.

My public service began with the Fifty-sixth Congress. It was my good fortune to draw a seat next to Edwin C. Burleigh. He sat on my left. I do not remember who sat on my right.

I was a stranger and a new Member in one of the branches of the greatest lawmaking body in the world. attached too much importance to my presence in that body. I was soon made to feel that there were others there who knew something and felt their responsibility. Mr. Burleigh had served in the preceding Congress. He no doubt knew my feelings, but not by word or act did he make me feel this. He was kind, so considerate, and so sympathetic that he won my high regard and lasting gratitude. I trusted him unconsciously. I came to him freely and naturally for advice and help. He was so tactful and so kind and so helpful that I was saved from many a humiliation. I did not see it then, but I saw it afterwards, and this fact makes his memory more precious to me. He did not treat me differently from others; this was his character. He did these kind and gentle things without apparent thought, and yet he was so tactful in it all that one knew the head was directing the heart in a sincere and unselfish way that he might be most helpful without being obtrusive.

He was not a showy Member of Congress, but he was a faithful and efficient Representative of his people. Their interests were his interests, and he looked after them to the minutest detail. While others were speaking to but little purpose except to attract attention, he was doing things. While others were entertaining the galleries with fulsome platitudes, he was doing things for his constituents by his work before committees and by following up and pressing the matters of interest to them in a quiet, persistent, and effective way. He measured his success by the results and not by his oratory.

One instance of his quiet but effective work comes to mind. After the census of 1900, congressional apportionment and representation came up in the House. It was proposed to reduce the membership of the House. This plan would have reduced Maine's representation. Mr. Burling took the lead in the quiet, effective, organized opposition to this measure. It was defeated, and Mr. Burleigh was more responsible for its defeat than anyone else.

Mr. President, this is but a feeble and imperfect tribute to a very dear friend. The orator may be reasonably well satisfied with his rounded sentences, well-chosen words, and fitting cli-maxes upon some lofty theme, but words fail, they are empty things, when one attempts to pay fitting tribute to a dear friend. This is my feeling now. Edwin C. Burleigh was my dear and good friend. He was a faithful representative, a loyal, tactful friend, a real, kindly gentleman, and a genuine true man. The world is better for his life, and there are many to whom his memory is and will continue to be an inspiration and a benediction.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, the kindly, generous tribute which has just been paid to Senator Burleigh by my distinguished colleague, is, I am pleased to believe, characteristic of American politics.

In life we struggle for the principles we cherish, urged on by the incentive of ambition; but when death claims one of our number we bow to the inevitable and together mourn the loss.

Nothing can be added to the biographical sketch of EDWIN C. Burleigh so eloquently spoken by my colleague. Born almost in a wilderness, far from city or town, he labored on a farm as other boys have done, but with a determination to become useful. He endured much to gain an education and to qualify himself for those positions of honor which he was to hold in after life.

To achieve success is the duty of every man and woman in America, and the accomplishment of it possible to all who are willing to pay the price in patience, perseverance, temperance, economy, hard work, and faith in the future. Senator Burleich possessed all these virtues, and having a splendid physique was able to accomplish much which would have been impossible to one of less sturdy frame.

Mr. Burleigh was successful in all his undertakings as a business men; his splendid judgment, his careful attention to every detail, his rugged honesty, his unfailing loyalty made him the trusted leader of the pioneers who in his early years were beginning to develop the marvelous resources of the great county of Aroostook, where he was born. And that confidence placed in him by his early companions was never shaken.

No man stood higher in the esteem of his associates than did

EDWIN C. BURLEIGH. From his early advent into public life he manifested that same interest in State and national affairs that had made him so successful in all his business activities. same love of truth; the same unswerving loyalty; the same fidelity to his constituents was ever present and paramount during his entire public service. Senator Burleigh could always be depended upon to do his full duty and do it well. His conscience was ever his guide, and to do right his great ambition.

As treasurer of our State, Mr. Burleigh was a careful, painstaking, and trusty official; and the books of the department during his term of office are models of neatness and accuracy.

As governor of our State he was admired not only for his great ability as an executive—and his administration will go down in history as one of the best our good State of Maine has ever had-but also for his simple, democratic manner and his fair and courteous attitude toward all opponents.

As United States Senator, he was privileged to serve only a brief period, but in that time he commanded the respect of all his associates and filled the office to a fullness which might have been expected of one who had served so faithfully in other official capacities.

But the phase of Senator Burleigh's character which appealed most strongly to those who knew him best was his love of home, and the reflection of his domestic life shone through his public career, as a close bond existed between the official and domestic atmosphere. The constant, companionship of Mr. and Mrs. Burlligh was a charming picture, as she accompanied him in all his hardest campaigns; and his children were consulted and advised with on matters of interest. It has been affectionately said of him that his family constituted his cabinet.

Senator Burleigh's death is sincerely mourned, and to those who knew him best his memory will be cherished as a loyal and delightful friend, a congenial associate, and a patriotic and devoted servant of the people.

In this world of contrasts-tempest and sunshine, pain and pleasure-we know that-

Every joy must have its sorrow, Every pleasure brings its pain; To-day is bright with sunshine, To-morrow weeps its rain.

To-day a smile is playing
On the lip and in the eye;
To-morrow tears are falling
And the fount of mirth is dry.

The calm succeeds the tempest, As the light the darksome hours; On the rough and thorny bramble Bloom the sweetly perfumed flowers.

Life springs from death's cold ashes, And in death life's lamp grows dim; In Eden perfect bliss is found, And from Eden cometh sin.

And thus in contrast ever Light and shadow strangely blend, To fit and discipline us For life's highest, noblest ends.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators I move that the Senate do now adjourn until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Sunday, February 18, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 19, 1917, at 10.30 a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 18, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. Jacoway as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer

Infinite Spirit, Father-Soul, Thy blessing be upon us to fit us for the sacred duty of the hour, a time-honored custom, a precious memorial dear to our hearts. Two great men, public servants, Senators of the United States, have been called from labor to refreshment, from earth to heaven. Ours the loss, theirs the gain; ours the sorrow, theirs the joy; ours the hope, theirs the reality; ours the struggle, theirs the victory. May the unbroken continuity of life which has come down to us out of the past, sung by poets, taught by sages, prophets, and seers, reenforced by the glorious resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, comfort those who knew and admired them and solace those who were bound to them by the ties of love and kinship; that the heart may cease to ache and tears to flow.

Be still, sad heart! and cease repining; Behind the clouds is the sun still shining; Thy fate is the common fate of all, Into each life some rain must fall, Some days must be dark and dreary.

So teach us to wait with patience till the veil shall be rent asunder and Thy ways be made plain; and we will ascribe all praise to Thee now and evermore. Amen.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we have, according to a beautiful custom, met this Sabbath Day for the purpose of paying tribute to a colaborer and friend, the Hon. James P. Clarke, late a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

Senator Clarke was born in Yazoo City, Miss., August 18, 1854, and died after a brief illness at his home in Little Rock on October 1, 1916. Senator Clarke received his literary education in the schools of Mississippi and studied law at Lutinovalty of Vincinia, avaduating from that institution in 1878. University of Virginia, graduating from that institution in 1878. He moved to Arkansas and began the practice of law in 1879. Hence, at Helena, Ark., in 1879, began a most active and conspicuous career. Almost from the beginning he was appraised one of the foremost lawyers in his part of the State, and, while he divided his time between politics and the law from the beginning, yet he excelled in both fields. There was not a time during his illustrious career that he could not have made many times the salary of any office he held if he had given his whole time to the practice of his profession. And he ran the gamut of politics from the office of representative in the State legislature to three times a Senator of the United States. He was elected to the house of representatives of the State legislature in 1886; a member of the State senate in 1888, serving until 1892. He was elected president of the senate in 1891 and ex-officio lieutenant governor; elected attorney general in 1892, declined a re-nomination, and was elected governor in 1894; he declined a renomination for governor in 1896, preferring to return to his lucrative law practice; he was elected to the United States Senate in 1908 and twice reelected to this high office, and was elected President pro tempore of the Senate in the Sixty-third Congress and reelected at the beginning of the Sixty-fourth Congress, which position he held at the time of his death.

Mr. Speaker, I remember quite well the first time I ever saw Senator Clarke. It was in my home town in 1894, when he was making his first campaign for governor. He was a young man then, only 40 years old. He was certainly a fine specimen of young manhood. Tall, erect, and slender, with perfectly white hair and flashing eyes, he walked up and down the streets calling upon and shaking hands with the voters. Needless to say that he made a favorable impression in that campaign and I was elected governor of the State. From that time on I gladly gave him my support in his succeeding campaigns. always personal and political friends.

Of course, Senator Clarke could not keep up his law practice after coming to the Senate, yet he was looked upon as one of the best lawyers of our State, and a wise counselor, during the interims of Congress earned a great many splendid fees as a lawyer. Mr. Speaker, very few men have been developed in our public life who could divide their time between politics and the law and at the same time stand at the head in both fields as Senator Clarke so successfully did. At the time of his death there can be no question that he stood in the very front rank among the lawyers of his State, and there can be no question that he stood in the front rank as a lawyer among the great lawyers of the United States Senate.

Senator Clarke was a man of very simple tastes, true and loyal to his friends, and preferred not to have anything whatever to do with his enemies. I have never known a man in public life who could draw a man to him more strongly than Senator Clarke if he desired to do so. He was one of the most distinguished-looking men I have ever known, and his mind sparkled and scintillated like a diamond. Brave, honest, and courageous under any and all circumstances, I never knew him to falter when he had a duty to perform.

Mr. Speaker, Senator CLARKE was no ordinary man; he was a man of great force of character, and brooked no opposition. Neither wealth, power, nor influence could persuade or deter him from the course which he had previously mapped out. He was independent in thought and action, and came nearer doing just as he pleased under any and all circumstances regarding public questions than any man I have ever known in public life. He was always an active man, both in mind and body, and was stricken of a fatal illness during the latter part of September, 1916, while at work in his office. Hence it may be truly said that he died in the harness.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Arkansas whom he represented so long and so ably in the United States Senate appreciated his great services to the State and the Nation, as has been recently attested.

The State legislature, now in session, within the past few days has passed proper resolutions providing for placing his statue in Statuary Hall in this building.

Senator Clarke, possessing a great intellect and possessed of strong will power and determination, made our Republic greater than it had been before, for it is by the lives of such men that States and Nations grow strong and great. The poet has expressed this thought most beautifully in the following linear. lines:

What bullds a nation's pillars high, What makes it great and strong? What makes it mighty to defy The foes that 'round it throng?

Not gold, but only men can make A nation great and strong; Men, who for truth and honor's sake, Hold still and suffer long.

Brave men who work while others sleep, Who dare when others sigh; They build a nation's pillars deep And-lift it to the sky.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the formal eulogy seems most unsatisfying and insufficient where the stroke of death has fallen and where a gap in life has been made. It is with profound misgivings that I undertake to make a fitting tribute to the character, achievements, and genius of the illustrious lawyer and statesman in whose memory these services

Senator James P. Clarke was born in Mississippi in 1854. 1879 he came to Arkansas. He seemed to like politics. In 1886 he was elected to the Legislature of Arkansas. In 1888 he was elected to the State senate. In 1891 and in 1892 he was president

In 1892 he was the Democratic nominee for attorney general, and was elected. He served as attorney general in 1893 and 1894. In 1894 he was the Democratic nominee for governor, and was elected by a handsome majority. He served Arkansas as governor with distinction and with great credit to the State. In 1902 he was elected to the United States Senate, and again in 1909. He was reelected in 1914, and was serving his third term at the time of his death. During his last term he served as a member of three of the most important committees, namely, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, also a member of the Foreign Relations and Military Affairs Committees.

I have had a personal acquaintance with Senator Clarke for about 30 years. Soon after this acquaintance began he became to me a study. Indeed he was sui generis-in fact, unlike anyone else that I ever knew. I had great respect for his abilities. was proud, and he liked a proud, courageous man, although he might have been his political or personal enemy. Respecting himself he expected to receive the respect of other men; and he was not disappointed. When he made up his mind upon any public question he stood by his convictions; in other words, when he set his hand to the plow he never turned back.

His death was a sad one. While in his law office at Little Rock alone he was stricken. It is said that somehow he reached the phone, called up his home, and asked for his son James to come after him with the car. Apoplexy was the cause of his death, his physicians say.

CLARKE stood among the foremost of the great Senator lawyers of his time. A great lawyer is naturally a successful and constructive statesman. The history of the legislation of the world exemplifies this, and it should occasion no surprise that the Senator's eminence as a lawyer signalized his work as a legislator.

The people of his State looked upon him as one of America's greatest statesmen. In politics those who admired his exceptional abilities and his stern unswerving character always stood by him with the greatest fidelity. They believed him capable in any position; they admired his lofty bearing, although now and then, finding fault with him, they did not desert him. Strange to say, he had among his supporters those who were not personally attached to him-these voted for and sustained him because they believed him a wise statesman.

Senator Clarke and myself were always personal friends, but I did not support him in all of his political ambitions. When he defeated Senator Jones I was not his supporter, and he knew it. We talked about it, and on one occasion he said: "TAYLOR, I know you are for Senator Jones. I know of your friendship and admiration for him, and I do not blame you for not supporting me." The last time I ever saw the Senator was in Statuary Hall in this Capitol. There we met accidentally and conversed about certain legislation that was then pending before the Rivers and Harbors Committee. He appeared in fine health, and I believe I never saw him in a more delightful

Mr. Speaker, I try to speak truly touching the life, character, and public services of Senator Clarke as I understood him and know about him.

Mr. Clarke became a power in the State when he was elected governor. Prior to this he was attorney general and member of the State legislature, as I have stated—positions which gave him access to the opinions of all the clashing interests of the State and into whose citadels he was welcomed and flattered. Each contending interest looked upon him as a man of lofty and independent convictions, despising cowardice and trim-ming, yet fully imbued with ambition and desirous of becoming not only a great man, but the greatest man of the State. It said of Cicero that he was so nervously sensitive to the fluctuations of public opinion that he could not decide between Pompey and the aristocracy on the one hand and Cæsar and the new democracy on the other.

This can not be said of Senator CLARKE. He cared nothing for the fluctuations of public opinion as presented in the gossip of newsmongers or placarded by speech on the public rostrum. He desired the good opinions of the public, but refused to bend his convictions to their notions—to the passions of those who might judge without knowledge and condemn without reason. He really wanted a constituency that would stand behind him like a stone wall, and therefore never modified his course so as to follow his backers—they were to follow him, although it was hard for his followers at times to see the wisdom of his

In his race for the Senate of the United States he was pitted against one of the best-loved and one of the most powerful men of the State, as well as one of the most powerful Members of the United States Senate. Senator James K. Jones must always be classed as one of the leading great men of Arkansas. To beat such a man in the zenith of his popularity and power indicated that for the time being Senator Clarke had gained a great popular following, and was on the billows of popular esteem and affection.

It may well be said that Gov. CLARKE at this time was at the height of his fame in Arkansas and just beginning to as-cend the heights of national fame at Washington. He was not an orator but a rapid-fire speaker of the Gatling-gun order. He knew his facts and was a master of arrangement; he studied carefully all the great decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and relied upon them to carry him through the emergencies of debate. No man on the floor of the Senate had hardly an equal power with him in brushing aside the little things and seizing the great and essential things. He had a logical mind and used it in making friends of those whose minds ran in the same logical groove. Politically he was a Democrat, but at times strained the definition of the word to a near breaking point. Self-willed to the extreme, he also ran perilously near to injustice in his treatment of his opponents. He seemed to think that he had climbed aloft without the help certain of his fellows, and that from his high position he could afford to be nonaffable. In the quiet of his office, I am told, he lamented this characteristic of his temperament and attributed it to some physical affliction rather than the lordly bent of mind that, soaring aloft, brooks no contradiction and spurns all advice.

He was a close critic of himself and never favored himself in these moods of self-investigation. He was genuinely sorry for his want of power to properly relate the little things of life, but no man can have all things at once. Senator CLARKE became a great Senator. It is extremely doubtful, however, if he would have ever become so great had his mind been compelled to connote little things or to give them the value they really deserved. He ignored the claims of extreme politeness and fellowship, and set his mind inflexibly on a higher end-an end which he invariably attained. He was a good reasoner and in this regard was seldom excelled by an adversary. In intensity, flery earnestness, and rapid-fire delivery he led, and seemingly was the only Senator of whom many of his colleagues appeared genuinely afraid.

He reached the highest empyrean of successful senatorial life, died a leading statesman, and was one of the most brilliant and accomplished politicians of his State. In his senatorial life of 14 years he had a very conspicuous share in shaping the legislation of the Republic. As a public man his career was brilliant, and he died as he had lived, unafraid, uncompromising, stalwart, majestic, and masterful.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, the custom of paying tribute to the dead is as old as recorded history. All nations have observed it. In this we but give expression to that longing after life eternal and that hope and that desire for immortality. In these tributes, whether in spoken words or chiseled stone, we express but the hope that beyond the grave is life, and that those we honor here there live again amid fields elysian, and because we hold that hope we pay homage to those who have gone a little while before. On this Sabbath day in this famous Chamber of the House of Representatives, in the city of the Nation, we now pay a national tribute to the memory of the late Senator James P. Clarke, of Arkansas. When I say we pay a national tribute, I speak advisedly, for in truth Senator CLARKE was a national character. He thought for the Nation and labored for humanity everywhere. In no sense was he sectional nor circumscribed by the boundaries of that State which honored itself in honoring him. He planned for a Nation and labored for a Nation as wide as the boundaries over which floats the flag of that Nation. He sought no advantage for his own State that he did not demand for that of every other State and for all our people. His allegiance was to the Nation as a whole. In many respects Senator CLARKE was the most remarkable man who has sat in the Senate of these United States in the lifetime of any now living. Tall and straight in form, direct and clear in speech, he impressed all who knew him or heard him with the honesty of his purpose and the courage of his convictions. Neither friend nor foe was left in doubt of his position on any question touching the Nation's welfare. As he sat day by day at his desk in the Senate Chamber, his erect figure, white hair, and strong and striking features, and the dignity of his deportment proclaimed him the Senator ideal. Even the casual observer marked him and instantly and instinctively paid him homage. He ruled the Senate as he did all other bodies of men among whom he sat not by the arts of the politician but by the uprightness of his motives and the greatness of intelligence. Almost upon his first entrance into the Senate he became a member of the steering committee of that body, which has much to do with determining what legislation should be considered. When the Democratic Party came into control he was elected President pro tempore, and was serving in that station at the time of his death. He was one of the greatest parliamentarians in the Senate, and he impressed all with his fairness and profound knowledge of the rules governing that body. He knew neither friend nor foe, section nor party as presiding officer.

He scorned to win favor or preferment by fawning or by appealing to base and mean sentiments.

Of his life and achievements I shall speak but briefly. I shall leave those for defter hands and more gifted tongues, for those who have known him longer and known him better. The barest sketch must suffice my purpose.

James P. Clarke was born in Yazoo City, Miss., in 1854. His parents were poor, but of character and standing. He received a liberal education and took his professional training, that of the law, at the University of Virginia, where he graduated with Immediately after his graduation he located at Helena, Ark., where he literally sprang into honorable place and position. Soon after he located here he married the charming daughter of an old and distinguished family. He served in both branches of the State legislature and rose to the position of presiding officer in the senate. Thence he was elected attorney general of the State, and from that office became governor. In all these positions he shed honor on the citizenship of the State and served well their best interests.

In his first race for the United States Senate he was defeated, but his defeat left no scars, and in 1902, in a State-wide preferential primary, he was chosen, succeeding that great and muchbeloved Senator, James K. Jones. At the expiration of his first term in the Senate he was reelected without opposition, and was again elected for a third term, of which he had served a little less than two years when the summons came.

From the day he first took his seat as a Senator until his task was done his was the dominating influence in that august body. No legislation of national importance that did not take shape and form from his masterful touch, whether it were tracing the course for the uniting of the turbulent Atlantic to the sun-kissed Pacific by the Panama Canal, or the framing of a constitution and a code for the government and civilization of the peoples of the far-away Philippine Islands, his was the fecund brain in which was builded the finished plan. For more than half a century the American people demanded, but demanded in vain, the right to elect their Senators by direct vote of the people. With a stroke of the pen, as it were, he made that an accomplished fact. Wherever men strove for human rights and human needs cried out for leadership and help wise men turned to him and turned not in vain. The merest recital of his achievements would require more time than is allotted to me, and I need not enumerate them here; they are writ large in the annals of his country's fame.

Of him personally I shall speak even more briefly.

To a friend he always bent a listening ear; to a foe he presented an unyielding front. Strong and just men loved him and followed him; weak and corrupt ones feared and shunned him. About him ever swirled the turmoil of battle. He feared neither criticism nor defeat; dishonor and cowardice he never Whenever his country needed a champion it found one in him, and with him as champion the weak became strong and the hopeless took heart again.

Death came to him as he would have wished it should come, while yet his faculties were undimmed, but after his aspirations had been achieved and his ambitions had been gratified. It came not in lingering pain nor yet so suddenly that farewells were left unsaid. In his own home, with hands clasped in hands of children and soothed by the ministrations of his noble wife, he fell asleep-

Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Beyond love or hate, praise or blame, in the city that he loved, literally buried beneath a mass of fragrant flowers laid above him by loving hands, we left him to slumber until-

Time shall be no more, and the sea shall give up its dead.

But, oh-

How many a loving one's blessing went With thee beneath the low green tent Whose curtain never outward swings.

Nothing we may say here to-day can enhance his fame. His character and his deeds are his fairest epitaph. We seek not in these exercises to add to his virtues, but in praising them to renew our own.

Like a garland of fair flowers we lay a nation's tribute this day upon his tomb. His life is ended, his career finished, but his memory is enshrined in his public labors and in the hearts of his friends.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the moment I first saw him in the parlor of the old Capitol Hotel in Little Rock, in January, 1889, to the hour of his death, I was perhaps as close to Senator Clarks as were any of his contemporaries in the public life of the State. In the September election of 1888 we had been elected to membership in the State senate, he from Phillips, I from Washington County. He was a candidate for president of the senate, and had called to solicit my support. I was a fledgling member, barely old enough to satisfy the statutory requirements of the position as to age; he was several fever antedating by some years the meeting to which I refer. I shall never forget my first impression of this remarkable man. He had the look of an eagle, a magnetic presence, and being young and impressionable I became at once his ardent admirer, friend, and supporter. From the hour of our first conversation, and throughout the years following, we were personal and political friends, actively cooperating in numerous public enter-prises and exchanging letters and visits at frequent intervals. He failed of election to the presidency in 1889, but at the succeeding session two years thereafter he was elected, and from that time forward, to him political preferment locally and nationally was sure and rapid.

Like most great men he was possessed of marked eccentricities. His temper at times was none of the best, and his control of the same not always exceptionally good. He had other peculiarities as well. One day a close friend of some years' standing called him by his given name. His friend received a sharp rebuke for this indiscretion and never repeated the offense. Senator CLARKE stated to him that he desired his friends, no matter how intimate, to call him CLARKE. cared nothing for titles and preferred to be Clarke of Arkansas, rather than general, governor, Senator, or Mr. President pro tempore of the United States Senate. In no event did he wish to be called James. I imagine that even Marc Anthony was not permitted to address the first Cæsar as Julius nor did Atticus call Cicero, Marcus Tullius.

The world is made of little men, but Senator Clarke was not of this type. If a man passed him on the street he would turn to look at him again. His figure was striking, his carriage majestic, his swinging stride and distinguished bearing at once impressed acquaintances or strangers with the knowlege that he was a real man. Imperious? Yes. Impatient of opposition? Certainly. Dominant? Nature made him so. With all that, at least before advancing years and ill health had seriously impaired his vital forces, he was as sweet as summer to his friends and gracefully polite to his enemies.

He once characterized himself as a good hater, and he was. With him there was no shadow land, no twilight zone between the things he hated and those he loved. Somewhat as did Pizarro, the Spanish gold hunter, the Senator drew a line on the sand, and bade his friends get on his side of the mark and his enemies on the other. And there he desired them to abide.

No other man was just as he was.

Like every virile character he was unique. He was as distinct as a snow-crowned mountain peak.

That he might bind a voter to him he never practiced the petty but effective art of insisting upon a relationship, real or possible to John Smith or to John Smith's wife. He never insisted upon his near or remote partiality to any church to tickle the ear of the zealous religionist. He never mentioned his lodge membership nor displayed its emblem to make friends more active or to induce his enemies to become less active.

He was deaf to the jingle of tainted money.

He flattered no man.

He was never an opportunist.

He loved the din of battle.

He fought his antagonist face to face, "lance to lance and horse to horse."

Like a white-crested eagle, he scorned prey that had not fallen to his beak and talon.

His restless soul courted combat and disdained a lower flight. Without consulting a single friend or advising with political associates, he determined to go to the United States Senate. He did not lay in wait for an easy mark. He sought out the strongest antagonist he could find.

In the tournament at Ashby Sir Walter Scott, in his incomparable style, causes the Disinherited Knight to ride into the lists. The rule governing the tournament provided that if any knight proposed a conflict he might, if he pleased, select his antagonist by touching his shield with the sharp end of his lance, provided he desired an actual battle; if he wished only a trial of skill, to touch his opponent's shield with the reverse end of his lance. As Ivanhoe entered he was advised to touch Ralph D. Vipont's shield, to touch the Hospitaler's shield—"he has the least sure seat; he is your cheapest bargain." But the young knight struck with the sharp end of his spear the shield of Bois-Guilbert, the strongest of the Norman knights, and thus did Senator Clarke in the political lists. Not waiting for a vacancy, by death or resignation, without the backing of wealthy or influential friends, with but a few years of residence in the State, he hurled his challenging spear straight at the shield of Senator James K. Jones, the strongest and most popular man in years my senior and already prematurely gray, caused by a the State, the leader of his party in the Nation, a mental and physical giant, and defeated him in a second effort with comparative ease. Since then he has ranked with the great men of the Nation, and was twice elected President pro tempore of the United States Senate.

Senator Clarke was a man of a remarkable mental energy. He was a master of terse, lucid, expression. Each of his sentences rang like a new-made coin of gold. His English was pure and undefiled. No man ever had difficulty in determining his position upon any question, either by the Senator's action or language. In debate his mental blows were delivered with the strength that King Richard exhibited when he wielded his two-handed broadsword, and with the finesse and dexterity displayed by Saladin when he severed the delicate veil with his keen scimitar.

He left no senatorial survivor who can with propriety and justice assume to be his superior. Few equaled him in courage, in probity, in mentality.

Last night 1 stood in Statuary Hall on the spot where John Quincy Adams fell in a dying state on February 21, 1848. From that point of vantage I looked round upon the circle of statues in this, the Nation's great Valhalla of distinguished dead, and noted among the number brave Sam Houston, of Texas, robed in buckskin. There stood the portly figure of Thomas Benton, of Missouri; yonder the marble form of the scholarly Ingalls, of Kansas. There, within a few feet, stood Washington and Lee, of Virginia. Not far to my right, facing west, was the priestly Marquette, of Wisconsin; and near him the handsome Senator Kenna, of West Virginia; and I felt that I knew that when our people make provision here for the stately statue of James P. Clarke, of Arkansas, that every citizen of our great Commonwealth will hold up his head, supremely proud of him, when looking upon our distinguished fellow citizen in bronze or marble, the acknowledged peer of any of his silent associates.

I last saw him in the Union Station at St. Louis, on the 9th of September last, as we were going home from the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. He passed out of the station with the same vigorous step that ever characterized his walk, never looking better, never happier. He was stricken within a month thereafter in his law office at Little Rock at work among his books. I know that he received the fatal shock with fortitude, and as he hoped to receive it, with his armor on his back, fighting the grim battle of life. How much better it is to die before the mind becomes eclipsed, the reason beclouded, and the limbs dead and useless. I have long since decided that it is desirable to hurriedly and quietly pass away like this.

Some time at eve, when the tide is low,

I shall slip my mooring and sall away,
With no response to a friendly hall
Of kindred craft in a busy bay.
In the slient hush of the twilight pale,
When the night stoops down to embrace the day
And voices call in the waters' flow—
Some time at eve, when the tide is low.
I shall slip my mooring and sall away,
Through purple shadows that darkly trall,
O'er the ebbing tide of the unknown sea.
I shall fare me away with a dlp of sall,
And a ripple of waters to tell the tale,
Of a lonely voyage sailing away
To mystic isles where at anchor lay
The craft of those who have gone before,
O'er the unknown sea, to the unknown shore.
A few who have watched me sail away
Will miss my craft from the busy bay;
Some friendly barks that were anchored near,
Some loving souls that my heart held dear,
In silent sorrow will drop a tear;
But I shall have peacefully furied my sail
In mooring sheltered from storm and gale,
And greeted the friends who have gone before,
O'er the unknown sea to the unknown shore, ator Clarke's life was a successful one. He

Senator Clarke's life was a successful one. He left a fair estate and lived to round out an enviable and a brilliant career. He died in the season of harvest—in the rich, golden Autumn, the fairest time of all the year, when the frost deepens the blush on the apple and the snowy cotton turns its white, pure face to the chaste kisses of the southern sun; when the meadows are rich with goldenrod; during the season when God touches with His artist finger the foliage of our glorious forests and paints the leaves as brown as the hazelnut's flinty coat as yellow as God's noblest metal and as red as the blood of a Saxon king.

Senator Clarke's friends have every reason to believe that all is well with his gallant spirit. His public and his private life was, we know, impeccable, > Faith builds a bridge across the gulf of death To break the shock blind nature can not shun.

It can be said of him in truth that-

He walked the rugged road of right,
And never for a moment wandered from the way,
To loiter in alluring shade,
Or drink the Bacchanalian draught,
Or pluck the idle flowers that fringe
The banks wherein temptation's wooing tide
Doth ever surge and flow.

A long good night to Senator CLARKE,

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, Senator Clarke was a native of Mississippi, and although his lot was cast with a sister State and his name and fame associated with the great State of Arkansas, Mississippi has always claimed him for her own, a son in whom she was well pleased. It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, to be thrown in rather more intimate association with Senator Clarke than is usual with those who serve here from different States and in the different Houses of Congress. Our legislative purposes were very much the same. There was one great object, the attainment of which inspired us both and brought us into intimate collaboration. That being true, it is hardly necessary, it is in fact mere surplusage, to say that I soon discovered in him a man of genius and of unusual mental force.

I believe in raw mentality, if I may use such a crude phrase; he was the equal of any man with whom he came in contact in that great, if not the greatest, of all legislative assemblies. That he came, through the choice of his fellows, to be the President pro tempore of the Senate when his party gained control there after 18 years as a minority was no surprise to those who knew him; it was, in fact, as inevitable in the orderly course of natural events as that the sparks fly upward. It was said and has been suggested here to-day that Senator Clarke was not a good party man; that he did not at all times recognize the authority of his political organization; that, to use a homely phrase, he was not always politically bridle-wise; and that is probably true. Certain it is that neither in the Senate nor on the stump in Arkansas did he ever "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." He never made commerce of his political convictions; he never traded or offered to trade, either here or on the stump, his opinions for votes. Nature had most generously illumined his great mind with the light of reason, and he used that divine attribute as became a man made in the image of his Maker. Cæsar says that—

Cowards die many times before their deaths, The valiant never taste of death but once.

If that be true, I think we may say with assurance that the first time James P. Clarke ever met the grim reaper was on the first day of last October, when he laid down the burdens of this life.

Blest and equipped as he thus was, with strong mind and invincible courage, no wonder he succeeded. He literally demanded the lavish favor of the fates, and his rise in his profession and his elevation through progressive steps to the highest offices in the gift of his people was as inevitable as it was rapid. I said, Mr. Speaker, I had been intimately associated with him

I said, Mr. Speaker, I had been intimately associated with him because of a common legislative purpose which animated and inspired us both. The last time I saw Senator Clarke he told me that the great predominant purpose of his official life was to secure the passage in the Senate of a bill which had been sent there by the House which would rescue his people from the ravages of the floods of the Mississippi River; and to that purpose, Mr. Speaker, he was as constant as the northern star, of whose true-fixed and resting quality there is no fellow in the firmament. Had he lived I think no man will doubt that that legislation would to-day stand upon the statute books, Unfortunately for us all, he was taken from us "like the summer-dried fount when our need was the sorest."

I have been to the Senate many times this session, and when I have observed the situation there, seen that great measure time and time again set aside for less important matters, and noted the absence of the great champion upon whom we depended with such confidence and reliance, I have almost involuntarily exclaimed—

Where, where was Roderick then? One blast upon his bugle horn were worth a thousand men.

Being a Mississippian, and being one who enjoyed the friendship of the distinguished gentleman whose death we lament today, I felt, Mr. Speaker, that it was proper that I should pay him this last tribute of my respect. There were few men whom I admired more than Senator Clarke. I was one of those who were favored with his friendship. From my first acquaintance with him down to the day of his death I had many proofs of it. We have heard it stated here to-day, and all of us who knew him realize the fact that he was not only an aggressive man, a forceful man, a positive man, but sometimes it seemed an overbearing man, a pugnacious man; but, as is common with all who are so blessed with force of character and courage, he had a gentler

A gentleman was telling me last night at the hotel of a trip that he made after adjournment of Congress on a train with Senator Clarke on his way back to Arkansas. This gentleman had never seen any other side than that which I have just re-They met on the train—this gentleman had his family with him-in a casual way. It was purely a social meeting, and there for the first time was revealed to him that other side of this great character. There was no battle then in progress; no conflict of wits, no struggle for supremacy, and this gentleman was charmed, he was indeed fascinated, by his genial personality. His little girl was with him, and the Senator was particularly attracted to her. Her childish prattle, her unsophisticated innocence appealed to his great heart which many strong men thought was adamant, and after he had reached his home in Arkansas he wrote this little child a letter manifesting the gentleness of that rugged nature which was frequently hidden from other men.

But this, of course, is the characteristic of all brave souls. I think I can fittingly close this meager tribute to the memory of a man whom I admired and loved by quoting that verse of Bayard Taylor to the soldier who fell in the Crimea-Sleep, soldier, still in honored rest Your truth and valor wearing: The bravest are the tenderest, The loving are the daring.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would not feel like saying anything to-day upon this occasion, as I feel I can not add anything to the tribute that has already been paid to Senator CLARKE, if it were not for the fact that my relationships with him for the last three years of his life were so close and so intimate. For the last three years of his life, while Congress was in session—and it was in practically continuous session—I lived and it was in practically continuous session—I lived at the same hotel with him and sat at the same table with him. I grew to admire his great ability as I have admired the ability of few men in my life, and I can say that I had for him an affection, deep and abiding, such as I have had for few men in all my life. I believe that he gave to me as much friendship and as much of his confidence as it were possible for a man of his age to give to one of my age.

Senator Clarke was pictured by a great many people, who did not agree with him or who did not like him, as being everything that he was not. Senator Clarke was one of the most human beings I ever knew in my life. As has been said, in the fierce struggles over principles, in the fierce debates, and in the fierce conflicts of wits he knew no favorites; he knew nothing but the guiding star of principle. And that is what should guide men.

Senator Clarke had the true conception, and therefore the old conception, of a public servant, and that was that a public servant should be a leader of his people and not a follower of his people. He had that supreme confidence in the wisdom and in the patriotism of the people to believe that if he were right the people would always finally come to support him in that right. He had a more supreme confidence, therefore, in the people than has the average politician of this day.

The thing that drew me closer to Senator CLARKE than anything else was, I think, the companionship and the love that he gave to his only son. I knew him after I had heard a great deal of him and of the rough side of his nature, that he was this thing or he was that thing. When I see that a man is capable of a great love, I know it matters not what that man has done; that man can not be wholly a bad man. If Senator CLARKE in his life had ever done a bad thing, it would have been a big bad thing. It would not have been a little bad thing. I know from my talks with him every day that his great heart beat in unison and in sympathy with the great masses of the people, not alone of his own beloved State of Arkansas that had done so much to honor him and that he had in turn so signally honored. I know that his heart was with those people, and he tried that his acts might be such that those people would be benefited.

I am proud that the State of Arkansas has had wisdom and patriotism enough to vote in its legislature to place the statue of that great man out in this Hall of Immortals here, because if they had waited for a hundred years and had searched the annals of the State of Arkansas they would not in my opinion have found his like again.

Senator Clarke was not an old man when he died. Although he had been honored with everything that the State of Arkansas could give him, and had been elevated to the highest office within the gift of the United States Senate, he was a man of only 62 years. I simply wanted to say these words in tribute to the memory of this great and, I know, this good man. I know that in his life he did not know what fear was, and I know that he had a divine confidence in the existence of a Supreme Being and of a life that lies beyond death. I do not know what conception he had of the Great Beyond except that; but knowing the man as I did, when the summons came and he knew that he was about to cross the Great River, I know that he was not afraid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some other gentleman desires to speak of the life and character of Senator CLARKE, this concludes the exercises to-day in behalf of Senator Clarke.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask unanimous consent that those who have not spoken to-day may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that those who have not spoken to-day be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As I stated before, if no one else desires to-day to address himself to the life and character of Senator Clarke, I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] to take the chair.

THE LATE SENATOR SHIVELY, OF INDIANA.

Mr. DIXON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution, and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the reso-Intion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Journed.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the subject of our tribute to-day, Senator Benjamin Franklin Shively, was a lifelong resident of the congressional district I represent, and I knew him well as friend, citizen, and statesman. And knowing much of his scholastic and realistic inclinations as I do I beg your indulgence while I give some extracts from Gray's Elegy, which he frequently quoted, as illustrative of his reflective moods and as basis for the panegyric to follow:

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.
The lowing herds wind slowly o'er the lea,
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight, And all the air a solemn stillness holds, Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight, And drowsy tinklings full the distant folds.

Th' applause of list'ning senates to command,
The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
And read their history in a nation's eyes—

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife Their sober wishes never learn'd to stray; Along the cool sequester'd vale of life They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

One morn I miss'd him on the custom'd hill, Along the heath, and near his fav'rite tree; Another came; nor yet beside the rill, Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he.

The next with dirges due in sad array
Alow through the church way path we saw him borne.
Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay Graved on the stone beneath you aged thorn.

Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere, Heaven did a recompense as largely send: He gave to mis'ry (all he had) a tear, He gained from Heav'n ('twas all he wish'd) a friend.

No further seek his merits to disclose, Or draw his frallties from their dread abode, (There they alike in trembling hope repose). The bosom of his Father and his God.

Such, Mr. Speaker, portrays the modest but eventful life of Senator Shively. If we can grasp the marvelous spectacle of the onward march of a farmer boy from the devout environ of an humble Dunkard home through college, through the law, and through oratory to a foremost seat in his Nation's council, we have a graphic picture of the Senator whom we here honor in formal tribute.

Others will speak of Senator Shively's biography specifically. but I shall only refer to that phase of his life incidentally and as it weaves into his public career. Like most great men he started from the farm, where so many fundamentals of strength and character are given to men and women. He was industrious and ambitious, and went from common school to college, from college to editorial chair, from editorial chair to the law, from the law to the lower House of Congress, and from the House to the Senate. Incidentally he was called to many high positions of leadership in the Democratic Party, having been candidate for governor of his State, chairman of his State delegation in national conventions, and so prominent in oratory and profound in statesmanship that he was frequently talked of by his party leaders as an available candidate for both the Vice Presidency and the Presidency. He voluntarily retired from Congress in 1892 after a popular service, and later was three times the nominee of his party for United States Senator, elected twice, and served in that body with national distinction for nearly seven years, having been called hence with more than five years of his second term unexpired. In this latter service he was ranking member on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and was frequently and safely consulted by President Wilson on the international troubles which beset our country.

As an orator Senator Shively had a national reputation, was a foremost speaker in point of popularity in a dozen States of the Union, and in his own State there were requests for Shively from the people of every county in every campaign. This popularity was due to two characteristics of the man. One was his ripe familiarity with current public questions and his captivatingly eloquent gift of presenting his arguments, and the other was his uniform fairness to the opposition.

It has been truthfully said of him that in all his life he never conducted a defensive campaign. His campaigns were aggressive. He scorned to misstate the position of his opponents; but having stated fairly the issue, no fact connected with, or consequences following, or conclusion inferable from such position escaped his attention. His knowledge of the science and philosophy of government was profound. He brought all questions to the test of organic principles, and with masterful analysis exposed the sophisms employed in defense of perverted power. His advocacy, always dignified, vindicated and strengthened the cause of his political belief by placing it on solid ground and giving the highest and best reasons for its And, furthermore, Mr. SHIVELY always identified himself with the cause. When the candidate of his party he was never known in any speech to make a special appeal for votes for himself. He employed all his power to advance the cause he represented and took his chances with the humblest man on the ticket. If he led his ticket, the fact was due to his engaging personality and the confidence he inspired by his freedom from personal offensiveness in the discussion of public questions, and not to any effort by himself not common to the interests of all his associates.

These admirable qualities of superior talent in both knowledge and argument were not alone the all of Senator Shively's power. His towering physique, his classical face, and his keen and penetrating eyes combined to make him a striking and impressive man, and as his acquaintanceship grew his rugged honesty and his sterling devotion to the cause of the masses gave him a public confidence that developed nation-wide proportions.

But in all of his illustrious political career Senator Shively never approved so-called machine politics. Instead, it was ever his concern that the sentiments of the rank and file should prevail. And so his leadership was never dictatorial nor mechanical. On the contrary, his power was in his genius to analyze the situation—discern the true condition of public opinion and then serve it. Of course, this ability and his poise served him well to make him a natural leader. Without being presumptuous or demonstrative his political bearing was at all times dignified and commanding. He was retiring, rather than vain, and this was admirable to all who realize that vanity is generally the attribute of those who drift along the surface, for those who are profound are, as a rule, modest and unpretentious.

Senator Shively was devoted to statesmanship and the political economy of his country. He never tired of delving into history and biography for inspiration and into philosophy and tradition for his faith. He was painstaking and deliberate in the consideration of every problem that confronted him, and this analytical digest of pending questions always gave him mastery in championing constructive issues and benevolent policies. And not only was he a thinker and an orator of rare gift, but as a writer he was captivating as well. His sentences were fault-lessly constructed and yet revealed no labored effort to detract from their elegant diction and captivating logic. Like the philosophers and orators of historic fame, the products of his resourceful mind and heart were masterpieces of composite English and wisdom.

Personally Senator Shively was always the center of attraction in any assembly of people. Versatile in his intellectual accomplishments, amiable in presence, and generous to a fault, he eastly adjusted himself to any environ. This made for a personal following as wide as his acquaintanceship. But he did not have multitudes of confidential associates. Instead, he confined close personal relations to a very few men, and it was often said of him that his most intimate and helpful friends were his books. Among the few who knew him best was Hon, John B. Stoll, one of Indiana's most illustrious journalists, and in recent observation on Senator Shively's personality he described him as one as to whose generosity there could be no diversity of opinion. He was big hearted, kindly, and self-sacrificing. Had he been a Colossus, no want brought to his attention would have been turned away unsatisfied. Often did he amplify the adage that it is more blessed to give than to receive. The warmth with which his friends always rallled around him strikingly attested his intrenchment in their admiration and devotion. And the popular esteem in which he was held in his home city was strongly exemplified on the day of his funeral, when thousands of his acquaintances lined the streets of South Bend in solemn mein, which bespoke their pride in an illustrious and beloved fellow citizen, and their sorrow incident to his eternal leavetaking.

Was he inspired? Yes; by the help of a devoted, accomplished wife and the divine endowment of two manly sons and a dutiful daughter. I believe the best impulses of any man's life radiate around his family circle and gain strength and character in his home. And at no time did Senator Shively's parental courage more richly bless his family than in his declining days, when his cheerfulness and resignation made him the same soulful companion that characterized the most thrilling triumphs of his remarkable career. He played well the part of a patriotic genius; he served well his country's call.

But for Frank Shively, as we so familiarly knew him, life's pilgrimage is ended, and the mystery of life and death is as complex to us who are left as when time began and the stars sang together in pæans of praise to the Omnipotent. And those of us who have suffered the pangs of unspeakable sorrow when death's messenger has ruthlessly called our loved ones from us can only know that they are in their eternal home where, and only where, the mystery is unfolded, a mystery that neither philosophy nor science solves, a mystery which only the consolation of a religious faith can in any degree clarify. We can explain by natural and scientific research almost anything but the problem of human life and the possibilities and probabilities of the hereafter. And these are comprehensible only by those blessed by the comforts of a living faith in Him who doeth all things well.

Here on earth we may accomplish much, and it is our duty to give all the assistance we can to the world's work. Personal satisfaction and consolation teach us all that such is our mission, and unless we contribute our share to the discharge of life's real responsibilities, watchman, what of the night? After we have accumulated wealth, after we have surrounded ourselves with home and family and friends, after we have achieved distinction in scholastic and social endeavor, and after we have stood in the leadership of men in social or political power—after all these and probably many more accomplishments there will come a day for all of us when, weary of it all, we will lie feverishly and fretfully on a couch that has furnished us refreshing rest in all of the years gone by; we will be surrounded by the family and friends that have been our mainstay of strength always; we will be attended by the best medical skill our abundance of money can employ; and in the midst of it all when it would naturally be expected that we will continue to depend on these earthly agencies for help, we will turn our backs upon it all and, reaching a palsying hand out into space, we will beseechingly implore:

Lead, kindly Light.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in the order of nature, which moves with unerring certainty in obedience with fixed laws, Senator SHIVELY has gone to that repose we call death. In the midst of his labors, while yet a young man by no means having reached the zenith of his powers, crowned with honors meritoriously bestowed with a future illumined with lights of promise, this friend and colleague of ours was suddenly stricken by death. Anything we may add will not add anything to the fame of our deceased colleague, friend, and coworker that the people of Indiana who honored him most will not now freely

To me this is a solemn occasion to meet my colleagues here upon the floor of the House, the scene of so many activities and victories won by him, in commemoration of his life and death. It was not my pleasure to know him intimately until he became a Member of the Senate. I knew of him prior to that date, but it had not been my pleasure to come in close touch and contact with him. His name was a familiar household word to the citizens of the State of Indiana and to the Nation long before he entered the Senate. He was born on the 20th of March, 1857, of poor, humble, yet honorable parents. His road to success in life was by no means an easy one. It was beset with stones, confronted with many difficulties; but possessed of a strong physique, endowed with a keen and piercing intellect, he moved forward, aided by an indomitable will, succeeded in reaching a commanding position in the National councils of the He was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth. Inured in early life to hardship, toil, and drudgery, his very surroundings furnished the means, the ladder by which he succeeded in making life a success. Left an orphan early in life, he was compelled to depend on his own resources, and resolving to win in the struggle of life he set about to acquire a fundamental education to arm and equip himself for the struggle.

He was graduated from the Northern Indiana Normal School in Indiana and later completed a course at our university at Bloomington, Ind. He elected to follow the law as a life profession, and to equip himself in this work he graduated at the law department at Ann Arbor, Mich., with credit and honor to himself and the university as well.

Senator Shively had not only a brilliant, but a penetrating and analytical mind. While recognized as a sound lawyer by the legal profession of the State, if he had not been caught by the lure of politics and devoted his time and energy to his chosen profession no doubt he would have ranked as one of the leading lawyers of the Nation. He was a student, a historian, as conversant with ancient, medieval, and modern history as a child is with the alphabet. He lived among the classics of the past, and through his intimate knowledge of history he was able to blend the past, present, and the future into a harmonious whole.

To him history, events, and epochs were constantly repeating themselves, and his erudite knowledge of the past to him was a signboard unerringly pointing the way to the future.

A profound philosopher, able through his strong brain to follow a proposition from its first to its last analysis, and after he dissected, criticized, and analyzed a proposition it was the last say on the subject. Through his keen, penetrating intellect he quickly separated the chaff from the wheat, and when done few there were who dared dispute with him on the finished product of his thought.

Senator Shively was in no sense a man that might be called a "trimmer" or "policy man"; in no sense a man willing to follow the lines of least resistance. Never afraid to rush in where angels dared not tread, but traveled along the lines from the known to the unknown, reasoning from cause to effect, he was able to arrive at certain definite conclusions on a proposition where he applied the genius of his thought,

Once having made up his mind that he was right, he was as unyielding as the rocks of Gibraltar. No power on earth could shake him in his views or make him yield a solitary point from what he thought to be right. In no sense a follower of public opinion, but always in advance of it, paving the way and molding public opinion himself as he moved onward and forward, always blazing the way, never waiting to have it blazed by others.

He was a fluent talker, seldom dealt in high-sounding phrases, yet able to hold his audiences spellbound for hours at a time while discussing the most common subjects of economic life involving the existence of our country.

He was elected to Congress in 1887 from the thirteenth Inlife to engage in the practice of law at his home in South Bend. Ind., in 1894; but the memorable campaign of 1896 called him to the front, this time as a standard bearer of his party's candidate for governor of Indiana. After the most memorable and exciting campaign ever held in the State, barring none except that of 1860, he was defeated by a small majority, not because of any weakness on his part or lack of brilliancy, logic, or argument thrown into the campaign by him, but because the things to which his party was pledged went down to defeat. Every child 10 years of age who heard his speeches and arguments in that campaign will remember him until they reach their three score and ten, or four score if by reason of strength they be permitted to live that long.

Accepting defeat as magnanimously as he entered on the contest, he again retired to the practice of law in his native city, but each campaign thereafter he was found on the hustings taking an active part in behalf of his party.

He was a Democrat in principle, precept, and example. He believed in the Jeffersonian principles of government and never afraid under any and all circumstances to espouse and defend them under any and all circumstances. Never a pessimist, always an optimist, a believer in the future triumph of these principles, and though he lived to see them defeated time and again, yet he firmly believed that time would vindicate them; that they would rise supreme and triumphant as the rule and doctrine not only of our Government but of all the world.

At the Kansas City convention in 1900 he was offered the nomination for Vice President at the hands of his party, but declined this proferred honor.

He reached the goal of his ambition in 1909 when elected by the Legislature of the State of Indiana to represent the State in the Senate of the United States, and was reelected to this commanding position in 1914.

Some of the brightest men of our Nation have served our State in the United States Senate since Indiana took her place among the sister States of the Nation. During this time she has had her Lanes, her Whites, her Julians, her Voorhees, her Harrisons, and her Mortons, and a host of others, and along with these intellectual giants stands, and will forever stand, the name of Benjamin F. Shively as a monument, a glory, and an honor to the greatness of the intellectuality of the people of Indiana.

He soon took front rank in the Senate, meeting veteran legislators of many years' experience in open debate face to face. His opponents quickly learned that he was a foeman worthy of his steel. Always courteous, both in private and in public life, never overaggressive but always able to defend himself and his position under any and all circumstances. His early education and training of mind peculiarly fitted him for a public career in life. His broad mind, his wide grasp of things made him master of the situation. He was especially strong on many of the great economic questions of the day, particularly the tariff and financial questions, the two fundamental problems on which the economic existence of all governments

I am not putting it too strongly when I say he was a complete master of the tariff question. By nature and training, a firm believer in the equal rights of men engaged in the struggle of life, and believing that a high protective tariff favored the few as against the many and that it enabled the few to control and monopolize the natural resources of our Nation, to oppress the many for the benefit of the few, he became not only a bitter foe but an implacable enemy of all private monopolies and at the same time an able defender and a Nation-wide champion of the rights of the individual man, and whenever and wherever he assailed this unjust system of taxation, whether in or out of Congress, he tore to shreds and tatters the argument of the advocates of monopoly. Many of his speeches and arguments on this subject will go down in history unanswerable, unassailed, because they were and are logically sound.

Perhaps the crowning work of his life along this line was exemplified in the enactment of the Underwood tariff law. While it does not bear his name, yet every paragraph, every section, and every schedule in that law bears the impress of his great mind. He firmly believed that if this bill was given a chance that it would tear the mask from the face of monopoly and restore equal rights, equal opportunities to every man seeking to acquire and maintain his rights.

He cared nothing about the trappings or the garments by which a proposition was clothed, but was constantly searching for the principle in it, and when he found it, if it squared itself with his ideals of right, he gave it earnest and loyal support. On the other hand, if it did not square itself with his ideals of He was elected to Congress in 1887 from the thirteenth In-diana congressional district, and voluntarily retired to private litself to him so to do. While Senator Shively had phenomenal success in life, there was nothing accidental about it. It came to him because he deserved it, because he worked for it, and because he had the ability and courage to possess it. He was elected among many ambitious men; not by any tricks of fate, not by a wheel of fortune, but because he possessed those qualities which make for greatness, brain power, energy, singleness of purpose, and indomitable courage to carry these traits of character into execution.

There was nothing sentimental about it. His devotion to duty was his creed. Absolute and exact justice to all, and everybody alike was to him an obsession. Honesty and loyalty were the points by which he ever steered his course; true to his conscience, true to his oath, and true to his obligations to the people who called him to their service, were his guiding stars and the groundworks upon which he built for himself a monument more to be prized and more enduring than the marble slab which marks his final resting place.

From this memorial exercise let us, the living, learn a new lesson that is as old as sacred history itself. The lesson is, "It is better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of fasting; that is the end of all man; and the living will lay it to his heart." A sanctuary of sorrow is a crucible in which to purify the soul. It reminds us that in the midst of life there is death. Let the premature death of Senator Shively be a constant reminder to us of the serious meaning of that heavenly decree, "Man is born to die." Let us bear in mind that our days may be consumed with impotent and helpless grief or our life shrouded with dispiriting gloom, but rather that we may be impelled to make timely preparation for the coming of the inevitable hour in which every man must surrender his own soul to God, who gave it.

To the land of the hereafter.

Mr. BARNHART took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, to-day we turn aside for a brief period from the active and laborious routine of legislation to pay our homage to the life, character, and public service of one of Indiana's most distinguished and illustrious sons, Hon. Benjamin Franklin Shively, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

It has been the custom here that those who have died in the congressional service of their country should have accorded them some permanent memorial of the personal regard and esteem felt by those who were associated with them in this service. Civilized nations have always mingled with their sorrow commemoration of the noble qualities of the dead. Benjamin F. Shively was born March 20, 1857, in St. Joseph County, Ind., where to-day his ashes rest. He was the son of Rev. and Mrs. Joel Shively, natives of Pennsylvania, who had emigrated to the West and settled in St. Joseph County, Ind., in 1854. Religiously they were of the Dunkard faith.

Young Shively's early life was spent upon his father's farm, and during the winter he attended school. He later attended the Northern Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso. During the years from 1875 to 1880 he taught school, six terms in all, and then engaged in journalism as the editor of a Greenback and Antimonopoly paper called The New Era. This paper was especially filled with editorials, and the young editor found pleasure in the preparation of strong and vigorous articles in support of Greenback and Antimonopoly doctrines and championed the cause with fervor, zeal, and unusual ability. In 1882 Mr. Shively was the candidate of the Greenback Party for Congress for the Forty-eighth Congress. In that contest William H. Calkins, the Republican candidate, was elected over his Democratic opponent by 391 plurality, while Mr. Shively received 1,948 votes. Mr. Calkins was nominated for governor in 1884, during the Forty-eighth Congress, and resigned October 20, 1884, to make that race.

The Democrats had already nominated Hon, George Ford as their candidate for the Forty-ninth Congress, and a vacancy now existed for the unexpired term of the Forty-eighth Congress. Mr. Shively having made the race at the preceding election as the candidate of the Greenback Party, both the Republicans and Democrats eagerly reached out for him to become their candidate for the unexpired term. Being much more in sympathy with the Democrats than the Republicans, he became the candidate of the Democratic Party for the unexpired term and with the expected and natural result that both Messrs. Ford and Shively were elected, the Greenbackers and Democrats supporting each of these candidates and each elected by over 2,000 majority.

by over 2,000 majority.

Mr. Shively entered Congress December 1, 1884, and served until March 4, 1885, and was the youngest Member in that Congress, being not quite 28 years of age. The Congressional Directory of that Congress in its biographical sketch of Mr. Shively, and no doubt the data, at least, was furnished by him, states that he was elected as an Anti-Monopolist and that he was in 1883 secretary of its national organization.

After his retirement from Congress, he entered the law department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor and graduated therefrom in 1886 and then began the practice of the law at South Bend, Ind. Mr. Shively was nominated as a Democrat in 1886 as candidate for the Fiftieth Congress, and was reelected to the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses. In the Fiftieth Congress he was a member of the Committees on Indian Affairs and Indian Depredation Claims. In the following Congress he was continued as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and was also a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The work of this latter committee was better suited to his taste and line of study. In the bitter contest for Speakership in the Fifty-second Congress he early espoused the cause of Mr. Crisp, who was elected and assigned him to membership on the Ways and Means Committee. He had given the subject of taxation a special study and was thoroughly equipped for the work of that committee. Early in 1892 Mr. Shively published a letter to his constituency announcing that he would not again be a candidate and that he expected to retire from public life at the end of that term. He again entered into the practice of his profession, but he was deeply interested in public affairs and continued an active participant in political campaigns and party organization. He served as city attorney of South Bend, as also attorney for the city school board.

In 1892 he was offered a renomination to Congress, and again in 1894, but each time he refused, preferring to remain in the practice of his chosen profession. In 1896 he was nominated by the Democratic Party as its candidate for governor, and made a vigorous and brilliant campaign. The political contest of that year was extremely bitter and stubbornly fought, but Mr. Shively not only endeared himself to the members of his own party but won the admiration and respect of all our people, but, with his party, was defeated by a small majority in the election. In 1906 he was again nominated for Congress, but was defeated in the election. In 1903 Mr. Shively received the complimentary vote of the Democratic members of the legislature for United States Senator. In 1905 he again was the Democratic nominee for the United States Senate, and received the votes of the Democratic members of the Indiana Legislature.

In 1893 he was selected a trustee of Indiana State University, and remained trustee continuously thereafter until his death, being president of the board at that time.

In 1909 he was selected by the caucus of Democratic members of the legislature on the twentieth ballot as their candidate for United States Senator, and later was elected by the legislature and took his seat March 4, 1909. In 1914 he was reelected to the Senate by the popular vote, and was the first Senator for Indiana to be elected under the law for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people. This election by popular vote was adjudged by him as the proudest event of his political life. During his service in the Senate he was a member of the Census Committee, chairman of the Pension Committee, member of the Committee on Fereign Relations, and also member of the Committee on Finance.

As chairman of the Pension Committee he enthroned himself in the affections of the old soldiers of the country by his broadminded, generous, and loyal service. No soldier ever had a firmer friend.

He was acting chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee during the period of our complications and trouble with Mexico and was the close adviser and confident of the President during that period and was the spokesman of the administration on that subject upon the floor of the Senate.

When the Underwood bill was sent to the Senate Mr. Shively, in committee, on the floor of the Senate, and in the conference meeting, was active and vigorous in upholding the principles upon which said bill was constructed. While not fully agreeing with all its many miner items, he was steadfast, earnest, and sincere in its support and passage. From the beginning of his public career he made a specialty of the study of the tariff, and he became one of the recognized authorities on that subject. There is hardly a place in Indiana where he has not discussed this question, and always with clearness and ability, and our people have marveled at the wide range of his information and admired his ability to present the same with such force and effectiveness. He was possessed of a strong mentality which enabled him to readily grasp and solve great problems.

Senator Shively was sworn in at the beginning of the Sixty-fourth Congress but never returned to the Senate Chamber. The disease that finally terminated his career had been making steady inroad on his vitality and was regarded as necessarily a fatal one. No man made a more determined fight for life, and up to within a few weeks of his death he talked about work he would do when he regained his strength and health. When death finally ended his sufferings on March 14, 1916, and the sad news was flashed over the wires, there were countless deeply saddened firesides in the State that gave him birth and that had repeatedly showered high honors upon him.

On June 19, 1889, he was married to Miss Emma Laura Jenks, the accomplished daughter of Hon. George L. Jenks, Solicitor General under President Cleveland; the devoted widow and three children survive him.

Mr. Shively was endowed by nature with all the charms of a fine physical presence and with an intellectuality of the highest order. He was tall and graceful, with a handsome face, an engaging countenance, a commanding and attractive address, and an orator whose messages were listened to attentively, and whose clear and persuasive logic enabled him to appeal to the judgment of his hearers. His speeches appealed to the judgment and not to the emotions. He dwelt in facts rather than fancies and in reason rather than in high-sounding phrases. He was one of the most forceful, pleasing, and magnetic speakers who ever graced the political forum of our State. He was always serious in his speeches, seldom, if ever, relieving the same by humor or anecdote, but they always bristled with facts and figures.

He was loyal to his friends, steadfast in his friendships. At times subjected to bitter and unjust criticism himself, he never deserted a friend who was himself under fire, when he felt that the fire was unfair and unjust, even though his loyalty might bring to himself added criticism. He knew the penalty of public life was criticism and ingratitude, but he bore them bravely. When political friends sought his aid for preferment and place, he sought to give to each unprejudiced and friendly consideration. When one would seek to improve his own chances by the repetition of rumors or reflections against other candidates, that man invariably ruined his own chances for the place. Dealing with others on a high plane of fairness and justice he had no patience with those who adopted a different course. He was slow to make a promise, but when once made it was fulfilled if he had the power to make it good.

Although a partisan in politics and holding firmly to the principles of his party, he was free from narrow partisanship and liberal and generous in granting to those with whom he differed the belief that their judgments were equally sincere and honest as his own. He was not one who was inclined to find fault with those with whom he differed.

He was a politician in the highest and broadest sense of that term. A politician does not mean in its proper sense one whose aims and ambitions are solely selfish and who seeks only his own advancement without regard to means or method employed, but rather one who has an intense interest in public affairs, fixed ideas as to politics and principles, ability to command respect and win the confidence of men, and who seeks power and place in the hope that he can be of larger service to his fellow man. With no thought other than the public good, with no ambition but to faithfully perform his duty, then the politician becomes the safe legislator and statesman, and such was the man, the politician, and statesman, Benjamin F.

In every relation of life he did his duty as an enlightened judgment dictated and as a quickened conscience approved. In all his life, whatever position he occupied, as a teacher, a journalist, a lawyer, or a public official, never was the integrity of his conduct or the purity of his motives questioned. He did not speak often in the Senate, but when he did, he prepared his speeches with infinite care, study, and thought; his words were well chosen, his sentences carefully balanced, and his diction was perfect.

Mr. Shively was never sensational or spectacular, neither was he vain or egotistical. He never spoke for the purpose of selfglory nor for the purpose of appearing in the public limelight. He never advertised himself nor posed and played for the galleries. He was modest and unassuming and had the complete confidence and respect of his colleagues. He was respected for his abilities and honored for his services. With dignity and with modesty he performed his labors, doing great things, but "unheralded and unsung" by himself. In the committee room, where the real work of Congress is done, he made his great impression on legislation.

Indiana has produced many distinguished men, and is proud of their records and achievements; she has had many illustrious public men and statesmen; she has given to the service of the Nation men whose services have not only honored them but reflected honor upon the State; she has given to the Senate Hendricks and Morton, McDonald and Turpie, Harrison and Voorhees, and now Shively is added to the list of our departed Senators whose services have shed a luster on our State and

It is impossible to state in formal phrase the many noble qualities of his heart and mind. He had no malice in his heart, no envy in his thoughts, and was always the same, always a gentleman in manner and in speech. I was a member of the committee appointed to attend his funeral, and I know the sincere grief felt by the people of his city and his State. The day of his funeral all business was suspended in every avenue of trade, and all sought to pay their last tribute to their departed friend and neighbor. As they honored him in life, they honored his memory after death by breathing the tenderest and most loving sentiments of affection and love.

Heaven portions it thus—the old mystery dim— It is midnight to us; it is morning to him.

These were the words written of a friend by Indiana's most gifted and beloved poet, James Whitcomb Riley.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, we are here to-day in compliance with a commendable and well-observed rule of this House to pay tribute to the life, character, and public service of Hon. BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY, late a United States Senator from Indiana.

I learned to know Senator SHIVELY more than 30 years ago, when he first served as a Member of this House. young man at that time, interested to some extent in the legislation of the country, and was a great admirer of Senator SHIVELY and the course he pursued as a Member of Congres watched him with much interest, admired the work he did here, and was indeed sorry when he decided not to be a candidate for reelection. I felt at that time that his services were needed in this body and that it was a loss to our State and to our Nation to have him retire from Congress. After leaving this body I met him occasionally, but my close acquaintance with him began in 1896, when he was a candidate for governor of our State. It was my pleasure and privilege to be with him considerably during that campaign. I spoke from the same platform with him at a number of places in the congressional listrict I have the honor to represent, and it was then I learned his true worth and his remarkable ability. In my humble opinion the most remarkable speeches ever made in the State of Indiana were made by Senator Shively in the campaign of I heard it said during that campaign that his speeches were too deep, or, to use the common phrase, that he shot over the heads of his audiences. But the consensus of opinion was that the speeches made by him upon the issues of that campaign and upon the great questions confronting the American people at that time were the soundest and most convincing of any delivered in the State. He held the attention and won the admiration of all who heard him. After that campaign I met him many times, and our friendship ripened and grew as the years passed by. It was a deserved recognition when Indiana saw fit to send him to the Senate of the United States. he was chosen to that position I knew he would do credit to himself, to his party, and to the State of Indiana. He came to that body not as strong physically as he might have been, not as able as he had been in the past to render hard, arduous service; yet he contributed his part in the consideration of the great problems coming before Congress. He had been a Member of that body only a few weeks until you could hear it remarked among the membership of the Senate that he was one of the most intellectual men of that body and the kind of a man who would have been chosen to do the most difficult task that could have been assigned to any Member of the United States Senate.

He served his first term and the people of Indiana said, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," and by popular vote of the people sent him back to that body for another six years. At the beginning of his second term his health was so undermined that he was not able physically to meet the task before him.

It is a fine thing to see a man battling against tremendous adversities of life. It is an inspiration to see a great soul endeavoring to overcome the moral and physical difficulties of the world. But to observe at close hand a man fighting for his life against such transcendent obstacles with supreme cheerfulness and rare courage will perhaps leave to you and to me a stimulus for the public good, a contribution to our official standards, greater than any forensic triumps that may resound through this Hall.

Eloquence may be sometimes preserved by the records of this House; wit may here and there leave a shaft to be seen in after years; reason and exposition may cleave the clouds of our doubts; but I suspect I voice the inner conscience of the membership of the House when I observe that you and I are most helped in the discharge of our public duties by contact with a clean, lofty soul standing firm amidst racking pain and lowering clouds that gather about the end of the journey and knowing no hypocrisy and no cant. One may consider himself fortunate whose privilege it has been to serve and associate with such a character.

Mr. Speaker, the future historian who writes the history of our Nation and of our lawmaking bodies will give a high place to the statesmanship and ability of Senator Shively. In his death the wife and children have lost a loving and faithful father, I have lost a good and true friend, the State of Indiana an able, faithful, and conscientious representative, and the Nation a statesman worth while.

Mr. DIXON resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, Plutarch has told us that—

Not by lamentations and mournful chants ought we to celebrate the funeral of a good man, but by hymns, for in ceasing to be numbered with mortals, he enters upon the heritage of a diviner life.

It occurs to me that these words have a peculiarly fitting application in considering the passing away of Senator Shively. He was sick for a long time. Courageously did he battle against the ravages of disease. By his sheer indomitable spirit was his life prolonged. He did not surrender. He fell fighting that mysterious foe we call death. Though a sufferer long, he was not weary of this life, and the fact that he was not weary of this life is the best evidence of his being prepared for the life hereafter. For it has been said that "a man is not quite ready for another world who is altogether tired of this." Therefore, I am of the opinion, that if Senator Shively could speak to us to-day he would say, "Lament not and mourn not, but rejoice that I am enjoying the heritage of a diviner life."

If there was any one evil that Senator Shively detested

If there was any one evil that Senator Shively detested above another, it was sham or hypocrisy, and he possessed a rare faculty for detecting it. He religiously abstained from its practice throughout his life. Now that he is dead his friends will not do his memory the injustice of indulging it through the use of fulsome flattery. In life he made no attempt to make himself appear what he was not, and in passing he left a fame that needs no superficial laudation. He believed, like Warwick believed, that—

Hypocrisy desires to appear, rather than to be, good; honesty, to be good rather than seem so. Fools purchase reputation by the sale of desert; wise men seek desert even at the hazard of reputation.

In consequence he was without ostentation, which is said to be the signal flag of hypocrisy.

He was not a self-advertiser. He shrank from it as he would from a plague. It was hard indeed for a newspaper man to get anything from him that seemed to be in praise of himself or his accomplishment. He was content to be judged by his works rather than by words used to advertise his works, and right well did his works speak for themselves. They have made for him a place that is secure in the appals of the State that so him a place that is secure in the annals of the State that so signally honored him and in the Nation he served so long and well.

He loved his friends and his friends loved him. He made friendships by the giving of friendship. His friendship was not "like the shadow of the morning, decreasing every hour," but it was "like the shadow of the evening, which strengthens with the setting sun of life." His was the friendship that is characteristic of broad minds. It overlooked the faults and frailties of his fellow men and remembered only their virtues. In turn he learned his virtues from his friends who loved him and who buried his faults in the sand. He was indeed an exemplar of Socrates, who said:

Get not your friends by bare compliments, but by giving them sensible tokens of your love. It is well worth while to learn how to win the heart of a man the right way. Force is of no use to make or preserve a friend, who is an animal that is never caught nor tamed but by kindness and pleasure. Excite them by your civilities and show them that you desire nothing more than their satisfaction; oblige with all your soul that friend who has made you a present of his own.

The most precious jewels that we can possess in this life of

The most precious jewels that we can possess in this life of trial are love and friendship. These were possessed by Senator SHIVELY, and he gave of them as freely as he received.

Peace to his ashes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, it is said that death loves a shining mark. When death laid its cold and icy hand on Benjamin F. Shively it captured a shining mark. I first met Senator Shively in the notable campaign of 1896, when he was the candidate of the Democratic Party for governor, waging one of the most active and able canvasses ever made in that State for a great office.

He was a striking figure; tall, erect, large in stature, with a handsome face, of distinguished appearance, he attracted the audiences before whom he spoke and created enthusiasm not alone by the manner in which he spoke but by the unanswerable logic, the clear and convincing arguments he made before the people.

The campaign of 1896 was one of the bitterest, perhaps, we have had in Indiana, a State of bitter political contests, and during my recollection of political campaigns in that State I never knew a candidate for governor who bore himself more nobly and with more grandeur than Benjamin F. Shively did in that great contest. Defeated as he was by a small majority, yet he came out of the contest stronger with the people of Indiana than he had ever been before. He was elected four times to a seat in the National House of Representatives and twice a United States Senator from Indiana. These marks of distinction and of honor were not given to him by political intrigue but were given to him upon his merit. He was not the creature of machine politics; he was too independent for that; but all the honors he received he won by his merit. He was strong with the people. They believed in him. He had their confidence, and, best of all, be it said, he never betrayed it. This was the source of his strength. This was why he held the confidence of the people and why they rallied around his standard and bore it bravely to victory. In him they had a friend upon whom they could rely, a strong and sturdy advocate of every cause for the advancement of their welfare.

friend upon whom they could rely, a strong and sturdy advocate of every cause for the advancement of their welfare.

Mr. Speaker, because of the evenly divided sentiment in politics in Indiana it has been blessed in the United States Senate by some of the greatest minds that have adorned that great legislative body. Men famed for their ability, their eloquence and statesmanship, men who have shaped legislation and molded public opinion, men who have fashioned the destiny of this great Republic; and when impartial history is written of the great work these men have performed Senator Shively will take high rank because of his splendid services, his great ability, and his unswerving fidelity to the cause of the people.

Indiana has been signally fortunate in the great men in the last half century who have represented it in the United States Senate, the greatest law-making body in all the world. The people of Indiana are proud of these great men and their splendid achievements. It is one of the richest legacies they possess, and they are proud of the fact that Benjamin F. Shively took high rank among these great statesmen, proud of the fact that he performed his duty in keeping with the other illustrious men who had been commissioned to represent that State in the National Congress and raised higher the standard of American statesmanship. We mourn his death, the loss of his wise counsel, and his genial association. We realize the value of his public service, of his great abilities, and how he labored to promote the welfare of the people. These redound to his honor and enshrine his name in the affections of a grateful public.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I court the opportunity to speak very briefly of the subject of this occasion. I knew Benjamin Franklin Shively for many years. He was a finished specimen of American citizenship, a patriot and a statesman. He was a wise, courageous, and capable man. He had many superior qualities, chiefest among which was his unflinching integrity. You and I, as the years creep over us, come more and more to place a high estimate on the man who trusts in other men, who believes that the essential elements that come into correct living are made so by such a devotion to them that they become our ideals. I like a man who has faith in his fellows. Who is the antithesis of he who doubts, mistrusts, and suspicions. Such a man has lost the value of living, in that he has himself written early across his life the word "failure," Two of the great words in the English tongue are faith and hope. In both of these symbols Ben Shively lived and wrought a useful life. May I say, without formality, that Senator Shively was on common ground with Indiana's greatest stales-men. There is one essential particular that adds luster to his integrity and his name and leaves untarnished his political career. He died a poor man. In that particular, strange as it may appear, he has a place with all of Indiana's prominent men once in public life. It is a singular coincidence that Hendricks, McDonald, Voorhees, and Turpie were all men in very moderate circumstances. That fact alone is a fine heritage to the youth of that great State. He was like these splendid men in another He was the peer of that galaxy of profound thinkers of the State of whom the people are justly proud.

Senator Shively was not an offensive partisan, though long and active and consistent supporter of his party. His devotion to it is shown in the fact that in the days when it met with the greatest reverses he submitted to its call when a candidacy on the State ticket was absolutely hopeless

Year in and year out he traveled back and forth across the State, detailing before great audiences the principles of the political faith in which he believed without the hope of any reward except the patriotic duty well discharged. His ability and fairness in discussion won for him friends by the thousands. In 1908 when his party came to power in Indiana he was readily chosen as its representative in the United States Senate, I need not relate to you the story of his successes. It is familiar to all. It is full of glory. When the Democratic Party came into power in 1912 the President of the United States found in him a safe counsellor. In 1914 when he sought reelection at the hands of the people of his State his popularity and ability were shown by the fact that though unopposed for renomination he ran many thousands ahead of his ticket both at the primary and in the election.

He was recognized all over Indiana and throughout the country as authority on the subject of national taxation. Probably no contemporary in Congress has given so much time and study to that subject as had Senator SHIVELY. quote a paragraph from one of his speeches to show the breadth of thought and strong patriotism of this man:

The solution of our problems does not lie alone in writing the rates of duty a little higher or a little lower, or in writing no rates at all, but in the coordination, control, and equitable distribution of all those commingling agencies of our production and distribution, in all of which every man must contribute under law an untiring service to produce and distribute the material good won by such study, such devotion, such patriotism to the myriads "who have sprung from the earth's bosom in this summer of political liberty."

Senator Shively was also a warm advocate of legislation in the interest of labor. When the proposition arose concerning the addition of a new member to the President's Cabinet to represent labor, he delivered an able speech on the bill on February 26, 1913, to establish a Department of Labor. select one paragraph of that speech to show the breadth of thought on this important subject:

thought on this important subject:

The American Declaration of Independence was an unqualified challenge to the whole political doctrine and philosophy of Aristotle. That some of those who subscribed to that instrument were not entirely free from the spirit of caste we can easily believe. Yet it was issued at a time when then existing institutions and dogmas were under the white heat of a remorseless intellectual and moral inquisition, and many cherished idols of power were being cast down and melted away in the flame of a revolution that signalized a new conception of the true form and functions of government. It is easily conceivable that in the fervor and enthusiasm of that revolution the sponsors of the great declaration regarded the humblest toiler in the Colonies as of more value to society than the whole tribe of titled parasites bred at princely courts of kingly power.

In every field of legislation he was a thorough student. He was a man of great value to the country at large. I have often admired him for his large heartedness and sturdy character. He was a man of lofty purposes and high ideals. He was so well regarded by his party that in the St. Louis convention in 1908 he could have had the vice presidential nomination had he desired it He was, in the largest sense, a patriot, and his service was always an unselfish one. In his death Indiana lost one of her foremost citizens and the country a man of the highest honor. He was a man of courage. Fortune never smiled upon him. What he was he accomplished through his own efforts and his resolution to conquer whatever obstacles challenged his success. I can not help but speak the words of Sarah K. Bolton, so applicable to the life and character of the distinguished Senator:

ble to the life and character of the distinguished S
I like the man who faces what he must
With step triumphant and a heart of cheer;
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hopes fail, yet keeps unfaitering trust
That God is God; that somehow, true and just,
His plans work out for morfals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear, Falls from his grasp; better, with love, a crust
Than living in dishonor; envies not Nor losses faith in man, but does his best
Nor ever mourns over his humbler lot,
But with a smile and words of hope gives zest
To every toiler; he alone is great
Who by life heroic conquers fate.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Speaker, when BENJAMIN FRANKLIN SHIVELY died, full of years of public service, there was lost to this country one of the ablest statesmen of all times. Possessed with a great mind that encompassed and illumined every subject he touched, Senator Shively ranked high in the annals of American statecraft. As a student, as a teacher, as an editor, as a lawyer, as a Member of the House of Representatives, as a Member of the Senate, as a man among men he gave all who came in contact with him through each step of his career the same impression of indomitable character, courage, and ability. He was not a leader of men in the usual acceptance of the term; he was more than that; he was the diviner of ways, the solver of difficulties, the meeter of trying situations, the one man who was equal to every emergency.

The sad intelligence of the death of Senator Shively, while not unexpected, owing to his long and brave fight for life, came as a shock to the Nation. It seemed almost impossible to think he had passed into the-Sinless, stirless rest, That change which never changes.

Taken by the hand of death from his seat in the Upper Body of Congress, his colleague's were moved as men are seldom

Among the membership of the Senate not one of his colleagues could boast of service in Congress prior to the term when he first served in the House of Representatives in 1884. It was an unusual commentary that he should be the youngest Member of Congress upon his ascension to statesmanship in Washington and that he should be the oldest in the point of priority of service among his colleagues of his own political party in the Senate at his death. It was the Forty-eighth Congress when Senator SHIVELY was elected to the House of Representatives. In this same House of Representatives NATHAN GOFF, of West Virginia, and KNUTE NELSON, of Minnesota, like Senator SHIVELY, were serving their first terms in the Lower Body of Congress. 33 other Senators of the Sixty-fourth Congress had previously held seats in the House of Representatives, none of them had served prior to the Forty-ninth Congress.

Some of my colleagues have spoken before me and have touched upon the splendid traits of the late Senator's character and life. Every word of tribute that has been uttered voices my sentiments. The esteem I had for Senator Shively grew more pronounced through the advancing years of the acquaintanceship I had with him. I speak not in extolling a man whom I knew only through association in the National Capitol, but through an association dating back to the early eighties when the young and resourceful man began to make his mark as a Democrat and as an orator. I first met him in Indianapolis at a political gathering. From then until his death, a period of more than 30 years, I came in contact with him often.

On the occasion of one of his last speeches before his election to the United States Senate, I had the pleasure of introducing him to an audience at Rockport, my home city. This was during the campaign of 1908. I will never forget the impression he made in discussing the tariff issue. It was the most wonderful exposition on this subject that I had ever heard. Eloquent in his oratory, but simple in his explanation of the principles of this great question, he held his audience in breathless attention. Senator SHIVELY had all his life specialized on tariff and taxation, and at the time of his death there was a popular belief in Washington that he had few equals in knowledge of the tariff.

Anyone well acquainted with Senator SHIVELY could not help but be impressed with his retiring manners.

He was a man who studiously shunned the embellishments of life. He cared nothing for the glory of a personal victory. As long as he won, he was satisfied. To gloat over a triumph over his political adversaries or to get out and hurrah over his political successes was not a trait in his character. Simplicity was always a craving in him. One of his friends remarked at his funeral, when others had noticed the simplicity of the

Why he wouldn't even let us celebrate his election to the Senate. We wanted to get up a big jollification, but Frank vetoed it firmly. He simply would not do an ostentatious thing. He loved the quiet of close communion with his friends.

I always found Senator Shively to be a man easy to ap-He never refused an audience unless circumstances made it impossible. Even when his health failed him almost completely he received his friends in his office in the Capitol ready as ever to give his ear to whatever might be brought to his attention. I visited him several times when he was too fatigued to set at his office desk. But each time he lay on his couch and evidenced his usual interest in the affairs that had come up, even though pain was written on the contours of his face when he talked and listened. I was a visitor at his bed-side in the hospital a short time before his death, and in his greatly weakened condition he evidenced a surprising interest in the prevailing topics of the day. Until the very last he was keenly alert to the wants and needs of his constituency.

It is in the community in which a man has made his home that one gets a true insight into his character and esteem in which he is to be most critically observed. While I knew Sentor Superior well enough to indee his more wants to the control of ator Shively well enough to judge his many worthy traits through and through, I perhaps never appreciated more fully the high regard in which he was generally held than on the sad occasion when his body was borne through the streets of South Bend. It seemed as though the whole city between South Bend. It seemed as though the whole city had turned South Bend is a large manufacturing city, and I judged from the faces and dress of the throngs that lined the streets and the faces and dress of the throngs that lined the streets and visited the Shively home, that workingmen from the factories had joined with the bankers, the tradesmen, the professional men, and men in all walks of life in paying tribute to the fellow townsman they had all loved. Here, then, was a man who had gained eminence by no fluke. His own people had been sincere in their suffrage to him in his many battles of campaign, red fire, and oratory, and in the harbor of the final refuge he was borne through silent avenues of a grieving people.

No wealth had been left behind this son of Indiana soil, but what is more greatly cherished—a good name—was bequeathed to a people who had thrilled in the thought of this priceless legacy.

The life of Senator Shively was great in years and great in achievements. His work in this mundane sphere of action has ended. He will be missed by his colleagues and by his country-men, but the greatest loss will be to his fond and noble wife and children, to whom he was a devoted husband and a loving father. May they have comfort in his honorable and success-

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, time is a great analyzer facts. Time is a great demonstrator of truth. Time is a great vindicator of principles and policies and men. Time will tell. In the great final analysis time will weigh and consider and determine the right and the true worth and merit of men. When time has weighed and decreed its estimate of great national policies and public men it will place the name of Ben-JAMIN F. SHIVELY among the great men of the State he honored by his representation and among the great leaders in the Nation he served.

Men build great monuments and raise enduring marble shafts to hold up their names after death. They erect great buildings, structures, and imposing statuary to hold up their names after death. Men climb to dizzy heights and chisel their names upon some high rock or lofty crag to hold up their names after death.

But in time the monument and enduring shaft will crumble In time the great building, structure, or imposing statuary will fall to the earth. In time the elements will erase the name chiseled in the high rock or overhanging crag. In time every vestige, trace, and evidence of the efforts of men in a material and physical way to perpetuate their names will be obliterated from the earth.

But BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY has built his monument in the great principles and policies of government for which he has stood and defended and promoted by his ability as a statesman and an orator of the highest rank.

There are some men who have obtained high rank, distinction, and national reputation because their names have been linked or associated with great and important acts of legislation in Congress, when the real labors by which the legislation has been framed and enacted into law have been performed by others. Many times men thus take credit and obtain fame by reason of their place and position in the enactment of great legislative measures, and not by virtue of performing greater duties or more able services than others. But the honor, credit, and distinction won by Benjamin F. Shively has been won by sheer force of his abilities as a statesman, his talents as an orator, and his zeal and indefatigable industry in the study of public questions, and his advocacy on the floor of the House of Representatives and the Senate where he has served the people

Mr. Speaker, I regret that circumstances have denied me an opportunity to express my full appreciation and to speak at greater length on the life and services of Benjamin F. Shively, late Senator from Indiana, but I could not refrain from speaking these few words in honor of his memory.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the people of the State of Indiana had through many years of his political and official public life come to know intimately and to hold in higest esteem the man whose memory we are met to-day to honor, the late Senator Benjamin F. Shively, of Indiana.

Born and reared in St. Joseph County, Ind., he resided in that county during all of his eventful and honorable life. He was long the most distinguished citizen of the city of South Bend, was an honor to the city, and was honored highly by all its people.

His was a strong, active, and analytical mind. He was ever a thorough student. He acquired a thorough knowledge of the facts in every case and a clear grasp of the principles involved. He traced much of the unorthodox teachings of political adventurers to "intellectual sloth," rather than to a deliberate purpose to sacrifice correct principles for temporary convenience or personal advantage. In his own life intellectual sloth was never for a moment tolerated.

Senator Shively was elected to represent his district in the Forty-eighth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses, at the end of which service he voluntarily retired from public at the end of which service he voluntarily retired from public life and to the practice of his chosen profession—the law. By that time he had gained a reputation for high character and great ability, that made it impossible for him to live a retired and quiet life, free from active participation in political and other forms of puble activity and service. His party made insistent and incessant demands upon him. It desired the benefit of his learning, ability, and sound judgment, and it never appealed to him in vain,

In times of public agitation and resulting political and social unrest Senator SHIVELY did not seek to avoid problems by denying their existence, nor by misstating their terms, nor by minimizing their importance, nor yet by attempting to sense out the trend of public thought and following the line of least resistance. It has not been my privilege to enjoy the friend-ship and to receive the helpful advice of any man who had a broader, deeper, or more accurate knowledge of American history or the fundamental principles of the American Government. He believed in our institutions. He knew them with the thoroughness that spares no labor and overlooks no detail, and was ever ready to give a reason for the faith that was in Like the founders of the Republic, he knew the centuries of human history out of which came the almost superhuman wisdom with which the fathers framed the Constitution and established the elementary powers, purposes, and activities of the Central Government of our people, exercising in full and exclusive sovereignty the powers, and performing effectively the duties cast upon it by the fundamental law of the land. He knew the division of powers and duties that necessarily results from our dual form of government, believed in it with all his mind and heart, and refused in times of peace and tranquility or in times of excitement or in response to the dangers of political storm or stress to forget that there is a dividing line or to change his mind as to just where it lies.

To him who has not studied the history of the past all suggested changes in the organic or statute law of the Nation or of the State are equally novel. They are as novel to their of the State are equally novel. They are as hovel to their proponents as they are to other persons, if all are alike unfamiliar with fact, the times, and the circumstances of their prior presentations, discussions, trials, and successes or failures. To Senator Shively most of them were ancient history, and to him history furnished irrefutable evidence of the degree of merit or demerit that must at last be credited to each of them by enlightened public opinion. This element of his intellectual equipment enabled him to maintain a steadfast restition in all discussions and to pursue a streight course. position in all circumstances and to pursue a straight course through every maze of conflicting interests and ill-considered opinions of men. Every student of public questions in Indiana gave great weight to Senator Shively's deliberate and final judgment. They learned only of his last and best thought, for he was accustomed to investigate, learn, weigh, and consider before he undertook to discuss a public question. He did not seek men out and attempt to impress his opinions upon them. They had learned to seek him out that they might have the benefit of his ability, scholarship, and sound judgment.
Senator Shively was truly great as an advocate of his views upon public questions. He spoke without manuscript or notes, but not without preparation. The speech as it fell from his lips was ready for publication, and needed not to be edited or revised.

He did not seek to impress men with his eloquence. sought only to enlighten their minds and move their wills. When he was at his strongest and best his hearers sat in solemn silence and he read the verdict of their approval in the stillness of their rapt attention, rather than in their rounds of thunderous applause.

His service in the Senate of the United States came at a time when his ability, character, characteristics, and his intellectual attainments and habits gave to him peculiar fitness to meet the exact duties that were immediately cast upon him. So long as his physical strength would permit he was a trusted and safe adviser to the President in the decision of those first questions growing out of our foreign complications, the correct decision of which has made possible the correct and unimpeachable record which the President has made in the establishment and maintenance of his foreign policy.

To us his death seemed untimely and his brethren can not but mourn. And yet it is not for us to judge of the times and the seasons. We can not know what his full mission was or when he had completed his allotted task. We only know that his ability was great, his attainments were high, he was faithful to every trust, and rendered a public service worthy of the great man he truly was.

His character, attainments, record, and high achievements make it impossible to write the history of his State or country without paying homage to his name. To wife, daughter, and without paying homage to his name. To wife, daughter, and sons he left a precious heritage of blessed memories and of public honors and gratitude the value and consolation of which they alone can ever know.

We who have known him best and to whom his friendship was dearest and most helpful shall ever think of him as one of the greatest of the great men Indiana has given to our national life.

Almighty God, we come to Thee for guidance and blessing as we are engaged in a great struggle for the supremacy of the truth. We know that the truth in its highest form can only emerge from human struggle; that out of the testing of character, out of the conflict of opinion, out of the clash of interest, there must come the establishment of those lines of right relationship between men, truth in its highest and divinest form. We pray Thee to guide us this day that we may have the light of Thy holy Spirit in our hearts and the light of Thy holy word upon our path, that we may follow the light as God leads us, to accomplish the supremacy of the truth. ## PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a petition from the Bethel Baptist Church, of Denver, Colo., on the subject of prohibition, which I ask to have printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the Recorp, as follows:

DENVER, Colo., February 11, 1917.

To the honorable Senate of the United States of America.

Gentlemen: We, the members and friends of the Bethel Baptist Church, of Denver, Colo., respectfully request your honorable body to pass a law to prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, and exportation of all alcoholic beverages of every kind and character.

The wonderful effect of prohibition after a trial of one year in Colorado has shown what great results will occur to all parts of the United States should a similar law be in effect. But we in Colorado are cursed with importations of liquors from neighboring States east, south, and north of us. We therefore urge you to pass the law immediately and not wait for an amendment to the Constitution, but deal with the poison alcohol as your honorable body has dealt with all forms and preparations of opium and morphine. Alcohol is surely a worse narcotic drug than the former, and should be treated in the same manner.

H. H. MCCULLOCH, Chairman.

Mr. THOMAS. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado for the establishment of tactical division of United States Army at Fort Logan, in the State of Colorado, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Denver, Colo., February 15, 1917.

Hon. Charles S. Thomas,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith a true copy of house joint memorial No. 2, for the "Establishment of tactical division of United States Army at Fort Logan, in State of Colorado," duly passed by the Twenty-first General Assembly of the State of Colorado.

I have the honor, sir, to be,

Very respectfully, yours,

[SEL.]

[SEAL.] JAMES R. NOLAND, Secretary of State.

House Joint Memorial 2. (By Mr. Crowley.)

Establishment of tactical division of United States Army at Fort Logan, in the State of Colorado.

To the Hon. Woodbow Wilson, President, and the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, respectfully represents that—

Whereas the European war and the rebellion in Mexico have prompted the people of the United States to adopt a public policy of national military preparedness, and to that end emphasized the necessity of providing and establishing ways and means for the proper tactical training of the several groups composing the United States Army and enhancing its speedy and effective mobilization in emergency; and

whereas the people of the State of Colorado express the belief that the present order would, because of the number of Army posts and their geographical distribution, impede free, speedy, and effective mobilization and concentration of the Army in case of military emergency, and that it should be found expedient to reorganize and unite the scattered posts into tactical groups composed of detachments of all arms, stationing each group in the vicinity of a strategic center affording adequate facilities for administration, distribution, and supply; and Whereas there is located at Fort Logan, in the State of Colorado cree center affording adequate facilities for administration, distribution, and supply; and

Whereas there is located at Fort Logan, in the State of Colorado, one of the regularly established posts of the Army, which has unusual and unlimited advantages for tactical training in drill, field, and mountain maneuvers and Army discipline; and Whereas Fort Logan is admirably well situated to fulfill all requirements for the proper military training of men and the administration, transportation, and supply of a large Army post, and its speedy and effective mobilization and concentration on either frontier or seaboard by direct connections through the city of Denver, about 10 miles distant, with all principal railroad lines of the central and western parts of the United States; Fort Logan has extensive railroad sidetracking, and at all times a large available supply of rolling stock, making it practical to immediately entrain for transportation great numbers of soldiers and equipment, there being a station at the post and three loading points within a few miles; Fort Logan is so situated that its quartermaster's department could be as economically supplied as anywhere in the United States and at lower rates than at most of the existing posts; Fort Logan lies on a vast expanse of upland close to mountains at an altitude of approximately one mile above sea level, enjoys an adequate supply of excellent waters, and an abundance of sunshine, and, because of these and many other advantages, it is an ideal site for the training of large numbers of men for military service in sanitation and wholesome environment.

Wherefore your memorialist respectfully advises, recommends, and requests that a measure he passed by your honorable body establishing military service in sanitation and wholesome environment.

Wherefore your memorialist respectfully advises, recommends, and requests that a measure be passed by your honorable body establishing at Fort Logan a full tactical division of the United States Army, with proper proportion of cavalry, field artillery, and special troops.

It is directed that this memorial be enrolled and that one copy be sent to the President of the United States, one to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, one to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, one to the Secretary of War, and one to each of the members representing the State of Colorado in the Senate and House of Representatives and in Congress now assembled; and

That the Twenty-first General Assembly of the State of Colorado, now in session, urgently request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to establish at Fort Logan a full tactical division of the United States Army, in conformity with the spirit and terms of this resolution.

BEAN BEST,

BEAN BEST Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

JAMES A. PULLIAM,
President of the Senate,
JULIUS C. GUNTER,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Kansas, indorsing the position of the President of the United States and his foreign policy in relation to Germany. I ask that this copy may be printed in the RECORD. The senate of that body has passed a similar resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PASADENA, CAL., February 17, 1917. Senator John D. Works, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We ask that you bring this to President Wilson's attention, commending your attitude. We are plain, hard-working American citizens, not agitators. We think this country should keep out of this world insanity of war. No belilgerent has purposely harmed us. All harm we have suffered has been incidental to the war, which is the climax of murder and all lawlessness. The questions with England in the Civil War and with Mexico were not allowed to drag us into war. Let us retain our sanity now. Not only has our national integrity and independence not been threatened, but not even our national dignity and honor. By all means do not let us be rushed into this war to save the profits of munition manufacturers and those taking our food and selling it at exorbitant prices to the belligerents.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have received a large number of telegrams from constituents of mine in Oregon, principally from the city of Portland, asking that the mutual life insurance companies be relieved from the excess profits tax as included in the revenue tax bill. I do not care to have them read, but I ask to have them received and properly referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegrams will lie on the table. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have also received a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Brattleboro, Vt., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Underwood amendment to the revenue bill, which I ask to have received and properly referred.

Gentlemen: Your card with reference to a "national referendum on peace and war" is received. I gather that your members would have been against the War of the American Revolution and against the Declaration of Independence. My first thought was to set you down in my mind as un-American, unpatriotic, and probably unneutral. However, I have decided to be as charitable as possible and to try to believe merely that you are lacking in just ordinary good common sense.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, Hon. James C. Dobbin appointed Admiral Dewey to the Navy. Mr. Dobbin was a citizen of North Carolina, and at the time was Secretary of the Navy. The Legislature of the State of North Carolina has adopted a resolution expressing appreciation of the people of that Commonwealth for the services rendered to the country by Admiral Dewey. I ask that the resolution be printed in the Record, together with a letter from Mrs. Dewey, the widow of the late lamented admiral, expressing the appreciation that Admiral Dewey had for the present Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

1601 K STREET, February 10, 1917.

Hon. Lee S. Overman, United States Senator from North Carolina.

United States Senator from North Carolina.

Dear Senator: I am sending you a copy of the resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of North Carolina expressing the appreciation of the people of that Commonwealth of the services rendered to his country by my husband, George Dewey, the Admiral of the Navy.

I am grateful for this tribute kindly sent by the secretary of state of North Carolina. My husband had a warm spot in his heart for North Carolinians, particularly for Hon. James C. Dobbin, who was Secretary of the Navy when he entered the Naval Academy, and for the present Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Josephus Daniels, under whose administration he rendered his last service to the Navy and to his country.

In the following letter written in 1913 the admiral expressed his estimate of Mr. Dobbin as Secretary of the Navy:

"Admiral of the Navy.

"Admiral, Of the Navy.

"Admiral, Of the Navy.

"Admiral, Of the Navy.

"Navy Department, March 12, 1913.

"Dear Mr. Secretary: Referring to our conversation of this morning, it gives me pleasure to restate what I said at that time, that I was appointed an acting midshipman in the Navy in September, 1854, by the Hon. J. C. Dobbin, Secretary of the Navy, a resident of North Carolina. During his administration of the Navy Department we built 18 of the finest ships of their class that there were in the world: Six frigates of the Wabash class, six sloops of the Hartford class, and six third-class sloops of the Iroquois class. In my opinion, Mr. Dobbin was one of the ablest Secretaries of the Navy the country ever had.

"Faithfully, yours,

"George Dewey.

"GEORGE DEWEY.

"SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
"Navy Department, Washington, D. C."

"Navy Department, Washington, D. C."

I wish you, and the people of the country also, to know that my husband felt for the present Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Josephus Daniels, a sincere affection. Only a short time ago the Admiral said, "I have been in the Navy 62 years, and have served under many Secretaries of the Navy, but Secretary Daniels is the best Secretary we have ever had, and has done more for the Navy than any other. I am amazed by his knowledge of technical matters. He has studied profoundly, and his opinion is founded on close observation."

Will you express my profound thanks to the General Assembly of North Carolina? I am, Senator,

Very, truly,

Mr. NEWLANDS submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Copper River & North western Railway Co. the sum of $3,102.92 as a refund of gross income tax paid by said company and held by the Treasury Department to have been inequitably and unjustly levied, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment providing for the establishment of an additional navy yard in San Francisco Bay on such site as may be recommended as most suitable, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to credit the accounts of cer-tain Army officers, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADJUDICATION OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6918) to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE ADMIRAL DEWEY.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President and the committee appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Admiral George Dewey, in the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington, D. C. January 20, 1917, be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY.

Mr. HUGHES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 366), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to furnish for the use of the Senate such information as he can secure as to the measures taken in the State of New Jersey toward carrying into effect a joint resolution adopted by its legislature by which the said State of New Jersey pledged itself to acquire and donate to the Federal Government the right of way for an intracoastal waterway across said State; and he it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to secure, prepare, and report to the Senate summaries of reports of Government commissions, officers, and engineers heretofore made, and such facts, information, and opinion of the boards or officers of the Army and Navy as he may deem proper or pertinent as to the advantage or disadvantage, commercial, naval, and military, of the construction by the United States of a public waterway through said right of way across the State of New Jersey.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I have received a statement from the District of Columbia Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ASSOCIATION OPPOSED TO WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Both the Republican and Democratic national platforms of 1916 declared against a United States constitutional amendment granting the franchise to women, and very wisely so; for with an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, 36 States with a population of 41,240,339 could, by their legislatures and without submitting the question to the voters, force woman suffrage on 12 States with a population of 50,731,927. (The States that now have woman suffrage have small populations, the State of Pennsylvania having more women of voting age (census of 1910) than have all the 11 full suffrage States combined.) Why should a minority be permitted to force its will on a majority in this country, and in so doing take away the right of sovereignty that has been recognized as a fundamental right of a State since this Government was formed? Why should our form of government be changed so that 50,000,000 people could be made to bow to the will of 41,000,000? What necessity exists for such a change? Would such a change be in harmony with our boast of democracy? If three-fourths of the States should say to the other one-fourth that women may vote, then they could say that men shall not vote. Or they could say that only negroes shall vote in the South, or that only Indians shall vote in Oklahoma. What, then, becomes of "State s rights" or the law of self-preservation? If a State is subject to the control of another distinct government in organic functions, it can only exist at the mercy of that government. No exigency can be shown to exist for demolishing the very foundation of State sovereignty and investing the central government with the power of determining the quality of the electorate, thereby taking from the States the very corner stone of local self-government and without the guaranty of local self-government; this Union could not have been formed. When the United States Congress once submits a constitutional amendment, it is submitted for all time and can not be revoked. When a State legislature ratifies such an rights.

Senator Thomas, of Colorado, has said that he concedes woman suffrage has not and maintains that it will not change conditions. We believe we can show that aside from the competition and antagonism engendered between husbands and wives and fathers and danghers and brothers and sisters (which is detrimental to the human race, for human happiness can only exist by harmony between the sexes), that we can prove conclusively that where women vote it is harmful from a practical standpoint, for statistics and election returns show that women, where they have been given the ballot, fail to vote as generally as men, and thereby the will of the majority of all the people is not so well expressed at the ballot box as with men alone voting.

FAILURE OF WOMEN TO VOTE WHEN GIVEN THE BALLOT.

and thereby the will of the majority of all the people is not so well expressed at the ballot box as with men alone voting.

FAILURE OF WOMEN TO VOTE WHEN GIVEN THE BALLOT.,

In the six suffrage States of California, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Idabo, and Washington—Oregon, Arizona, and Kansas did not adopt woman suffrage till November 5, 1912—the abstract of United States census of 1910, pages 110 and 118, shows there were in April, 1910, 3,170,153 men and women 21 years of age and over, exclusive of Japanese and Chinese. The total vote actually cast for President November 5, 1912, in the then six woman-suffrage States was 1,521,590, so 47.9 per cent of the men and women over 21 years of age, exclusive of Japanese and Chinese, actually voted. In the six adjoining and neighboring States (where there are similar laws regarding voting except as to sex) of Kansas, Nebraska, Oregon, Nevada, South Dakota, and Missouri where men alone voted, the total number of men 21 years of age and over, exclusive of Japanese and Chinese, was (in April, 1910, Abstract of Census, p. 110) 2,295,119; total vote in the six male-suffrage States for President November 5, 1912, 1,587,984; 69.1 per cent of the men over 21 years of age, exclusive of Japanese and Chinese, actually voted, or about 22 per cent more of the possible voters in the male-suffrage States voted than did the possible voters of the six adjoining woman-suffrage States, as men in the adjoining male-suffrage States did vote, then an analysis of the figures show that only 19.1 per cent of the women over 21 years of age in the six women-suffrage States actually voted. If more than 19.1 per cent of women did vote in the six woman-suffrage States, then less than 69.1 per cent of the men voted; so it is impossible to escape one or the other conclusion—that the women do not vote as generally as men when given the ballot, or if they do their voting does cause less interest to be taken in politics by men, and in either event woman suffrage is harmful to the Republic.

According to

In San Francisco, in the latter part of 1912, at a local-option election, out of 120,859 women over 21 years of age in the city 40,655 women and 89,023 men registered, yet only 15,087 votes, all told, were cast for local option, and it is estimated that approximately 1 woman in 8 who was interested enough to register took the trouble to go to the polls.

At a city election in San Francisco November 11, 1913, 49,833 women registered and 19,678 voted, about one-quarter of the votes in this election being cast by women. In three precincts no women voted; in 49 out of 675 precincts there was an average of less than 10 votes per precinct by women. (Analysis of votes by Registrar of Elections Zemanski. See Los Angeles Times, Nov. 20, 1913.) Census of 1910 shows there were 120,859 women over 21 years of age in San Francisco, so only 16.2 per cent voted in election of November 11, 1913. At an election March 24, 1913, in Los Angeles, Cal., involving radical changes in the city charter, only 31,000 voters, men and women, out of 222,817, cast their ballots, this, too, after a citizens' committee of 1,000 advocated in all the newspapers the adoption of certain propositions and the defeat of others. Nine out of ten of the reform measures were defeated. The Los Angeles Times of March 26, 1913, says:

"The vote of the women was disappointing. In some precincts it was a negligible quantity, while in others it was only about one-third of the total, yet suffragists carried on an active campaign, attended and spoke at all-day meetings, and even worked at their headquarters on Easter Sunday."

At an election June 3, 1913, in Los Angeles, for mayor, Rose was elected by 8,037 majority over Shenk. Los Angeles had "good government" officials for several years before women had the ballot. Rose ran on an "open-town" platform and Shenk on "good government" officials for several years before women had the ballot. Rose ran on an "open-town" platform and Shenk on "good government" officials for several years before women had the ballot. Ros

[From the Los Angeles Times, Oct. 27, 1915.]

"Two women voted yesterday at the city hall out of 71 registered. This is an average of less than 3 in 190, with ideal conditions for exercising the suffrage. None need to walk more than two blocks on perfect sidewalks and pavements in entrancing weather."

When we realize that this election was on important State constitutional amendments, it proves that the women in California are not so eager to vote as the agitators in the East would have the people believe.

At an election in Chicago April 7, 1914, with the strenuous efforts of the suffragists to get out the female vote, only 158,686 women voted. Chicago had, in 1910, 626,629 women over 21 years of age. (Letter from Director of Census, Feb. 28, 1914.) About 25 per cent of the women of Chicago over 21 years of age voted. More than double that number of men voted at the same election.

Most of the women who vote in the woman-suffrage States do so in self-defense, or at the earnest appeal of the male members of their families, and not because they want the ballot, for if such women did not vote they would lose their own and their husband's political status, with which they were satisfied under male suffrage, and must either vote or live under the laws to which they are opposed. For this reason it is unjust to place the burden on a majority of women in order that a few aggressive, forward, notoriety-seeking women can get into politics, some of whom resent the fact that they were created women and not men.

son it is unjust to place the burden on a majority of women in order that a few aggressive, forward, notoriety-seeking women can get into politics, some of whom resent the fact that they were created women and not men.

Helen M. Foster, in Los Angeles Times, November 7, 1913, under the head of "Woman lectures woman," commends Senator Works for daring to call attention to the neglect of citizenship by women voters, which she says are facts backed up by data and registration lists.

If further evidence were needed to prove that women, when given the ballot, will not vote as generally as men, the city election April 4, 1916, in Chicago leaves no doubt on that point. The official vote shows that 328,199 men voted and only 140,195 women. (Letter from chief clerk of board of election commissioners, Jan. 6, 1917.) Suffragists have claimed that the votes of women would be of such great help in city elections, in having laws enacted for pure milk, sanitation, and other laws for the special benefit of children and the home; yet we find 232 men to every 100 women voting in Chicago. Also at the election November 7, 1916, in Illinois, there were 150 men's votes to every 100 women's. Illinois has partial suffrage for women and is the only State where the votes of men and women are counted separately. The number of women eligible to vote in Illinois is about the same as the number of men. Also the number of men and women of voting age eligible to vote in Chicago is about equal, as there are more allen males than alien females in Chicago and the same is true of the State of Illinois.

males than alien females in Chicago and the same is true of the State of Illinois.

An editorial in the San Francisco (Cal.) Chronicle, January 3, 1915, says: "In this and other States the franchise was given without waiting for the request of the majority of the sex, and as the event has shown without the desire of a majority. It is even more than probable that were the question of the withdrawal of the right submitted to a vote in this State, with the women voting, the right would be withdrawn. There are multitudes of women who would register for such an election for the sole purpose of getting rid of a duty they detest and whose obligations they refuse to fulfill."

THE WOMAN'S VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

THE WOMAN'S VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

The woman's party announced that they had half a million dellars to spend for the defeat of President Wilson. Having hundreds of workers in the suffrage States, they declared that they would carry those States for Mr. Hughes with the votes of women, but instead of doing so States that have been normally Republican for years gave majorities for President Wilson. (Ten of the 11 full-sufrage States giving their vote for the Democratic candidate.)

In Illinois Secretary Emmerson's report shows 1,316,007 men and 876,700 women voted at the election November 7, 1916, and the per cent of women's votes cast for President Wilson was practically the same as the per cent of the men's votes cast for him, which proves that the woman's vote can no more be delivered for or against a candidate than can the farmer's vote, the church people's vote, or any other vote. The threats of the suffragists are idle boasts, and will no longer influence even the timid politician.

TAXATION AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The suffragists, who have taken the slogan of our Colonies, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," utterly fail in endeavoring thereby to show a parallel between women without the ballot to-day and the condition of the Colonies in 1775. The men—the British Parliament— who voted the taxes on the colonists paid no part of the taxes they laid, and the more they could extort from the American Colonies the less the Englishmen would have to pay themselves, whereas to-day in the United States the men voting the taxes pay the larger part of the same. In our country only about one-eighth of the women of voting age pay taxes direct or indirect, so if women had the ballot the women who pay the taxes would not be so fairly and justly treated as they are now, for then about seven-eighths of the women voters would pay no taxes, while the men alone voting more than seven-eighths of the voters are taxpayers and pay about seven-eighths of all taxes. As men always have and always will produce the greater part of the wealth, they will always pay the greater part of the wealth, they will always pay the greater part of the amount. Most of the property on which women pay taxes is the fruits of the labor of male members of their families acquired by gift, will, or placed in the names of women for some other reason. It would be absurd to believe that the men, nearly all of whom pay taxes, would vote unreasonable taxes on themselves in order to have the small per cent of women who pay taxes mjustly taxed. If women had the ballot the per cent of nontax-paying voters would be greatly increased, and taxpayers of both sexes would have a greater percentage of voters who would not be taxpayers to vote taxes on their property than with men alone voting age in the Southern States than negro men and women together. (Their statement is erroneous, as Abstract of Census, 1910, pp. 110 and 119, shows that there are more white women of voting age in the Southern States then negro men and women together. (Their statement is erroneous, as Abstr cent.

In the 11 States above mentioned the per cent of negro women of voting age to all women over 21 years of age is 35.3 per cent, while the per cent of negro men of voting age to all men over 21 is only 33.6 per cent. Who would doubt that a larger per cent of negro women who were eligible would vote than white women? Who would contend that if the Southern States should ratify or have forced upon them a United, States constitutional amendment granting the franchise to women that the Federal Government would permit the negro race to be discriminated against by State laws in voting?

women that the Federal Government would permit the negro race to be discriminated against by State laws in voting?

PROHIBITION AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

So many people are being misled on the liquor question by the suffragists that it is well to submit some facts on the subject. Prior to November 3, 1914, in no State in which women voted on the question had State-wide prohibition ever been adopted. Ten States where men alone voted had State-wide prohibition. November 5, 1912. Colorado voted on State-wide prohibition: 75,877 votes were cast for the measure and 116,774 against it. (See Abstract of Votes, compiled from official returns by James B. Pearce, secretary of state, Denver, Colo.) If 58 per cent of the women over 21 years of age in Colorado had voted for prohibition the measure would have become a law by 7,912 majority, without a single male vote being cast for prohibition, there being 213,425 women over 21 years of age in Colorado. (Abstract of Census, 1910, p. 118.)

Wyoming legalized gambling for about 40 years after women had the ballot, and had neither State-wide prohibition nor local-option laws.

About six years prior to the adoption of woman suffrage in California Los Angeles voted on local option, and the measure was defeated by nearly 2 to 1. About a month after women had the ballot in Los Angeles the question was again voted on, and the saloons won by nearly 3 to 1.

Women have had the franchise five and one-half years in Pasadena, Cal., and the sale of liquor has been legalized ever since women were given the ballot. Pasadena has 2,688 more women than men over 21 years of age (census 1910), about 29 per cent.

December 2, 1913, Santa Monica, Cal., voted wet; ballots nearly 3 to 1 for liquor, for liquor to be sold on Sandays and nights. Los Angeles Times of December 3 says: "The triumph of 'demon rum' and the sparkling cabaret is attributed to the women, who voted 3 to 1 against a Sunday frouth." Total vote for the saloons and Sunday sillour legalized in cafés all night and Sundays in a city of hom PROHIBITION AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

had been dry, returned to the wet colmun. (See Los Angeles Times, Apr. 14, 1914.) Only I small county in California, Lake County, was dry, and only 10 counties out of 62 in Colorado were dry.

In Colorado Springs, Colo., where the sale of liquor was prohibited for many years, when women voted on the question about four years ago liquor selling was legalized. Colorado Springs had $19 more women than men over 21 years of age in 1910 (letter of Director of Con pages 208-299, Annual Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, you will find that in the 8 States that had woman suffrage January I, 1913, Colorado, California, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, Washington, Arizona, and Oregon, there were 28,108 liquor dealers paying special license to the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. From page 24, Abstract of Census, 1914 on 6,0452; 1 liquor dealer for every 211 people for the 8 States. For the remaining 40 States and District of Columbia there were 225,299 liquor dealers paying licenses for the same period. The 40 States and the District of Columbia had a population of $5,931,674, or 1 liquor dealer for every 311 people for the 8 States. For the remaining 40 States and the District of Columbia had a population of $5,931,674, or 1 liquor dealer for every 321 people, or about one-half the number of dealers per capita that the work of the control of the suffage and the suffage of the control of the suffage and the suffage of the control of the suffage and the suffage of the suffage and the suffage of the suffage and the suffage of the suffage and suffage and the suffage of the suffage and suffage and the suffage of the suffage and suffage and the suffage and suffage and suffage and suffage and the suffage and suf mittee on woman suffrages, said: "The United Brewers' Association states that the antisuffragists have never received nor asked for contributions from them," although, he adds, "we have had appeals from the other side."

May Wright Sewall said, October 30, 1913, in Milwaukee, "Votes for women will no more prohibit drink than they will prohibit food." Mrs. Grace Wilbur Trout, president of the Ilflnois Equal Suffrage Association, and one of the leaders in the lobby at Springfield which brought about the enactment of the suffrage bill, said:

"It is a great pleasure to remember that some of the firmest supporters of the suffrage measure in the forty-eighth general assembly were some of the so-called wets."

Suffragists have said that the reason the woman-suffrage States had not adopted prohibition was because there were so many miners in those States and that men outnumbered the women so greatly. The six States that had woman suffrage November 1, 1912—California, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, and Washington—had in December, 1909, 78,565 wage earners engaged in mining industries. (Abstract of Census 1910, p. 561.) Total number of men over 21 years of age in the six States, 1,911,518 (abstract of Census 1910, p. 107), or about 1 man of every 24 a miner. West Virginia, a prohibition State, had 78,404 wage earners in the mining industry and had in 1910, 338,349 men over 21 years of age, or about 1 man out of every 4 a miner. Alabama, that voted State-wide prohibition, had about 1 man out of every 16 engaged in mining, and Kansas (Kansas adopted prohibition about 30 years ago) had only a few less per capita engaged in mining than the six woman-suffrage States, and yet West Virginia, with nearly six times the number of men per capita over 21 years of age working in mines, and with Alabama with one-third more per capita, and Kansas with only a few less per capita of miners than woman suffrage States, all voted State-wide prohibition with men's votes only. Santa Monica and Pasadena, Cal., and Colorado Springs, Colo., al women has changed but little in two years. California, with 137 men to 100 women of voting age, defeated prohibition by 169,345, while Washington, with 158,9 men to 100 women, adopted prohibition by over 18,000 majority, and Oregon, with 152.8 men to 100 women, by 36,480. Taking the vote collectively of the five woman-suffrage States that voted on prohibition in 1914, the majority against prohibition was 99,416; population of the five States, 5,195,682. Taking the vote of the two male-suffrage States that voted on prohibition the same year, Ohlo and Virginia—population, 6,828,733—the majority against prohibition was only 53,787; Ohlo, which has very large brewing, distilling, wholesale, and retail liquor interests, voted against prohibition by only 84,152, and about 40,600 in 1915, while California, whose wine and ilquor interests are probably very much less, computed in dollars and cents, voted against prohibition by 169,245, and California has only about and the population of Ohlo. So anyone who will make an not women's votes that bring prohibition of use general sentiment being worked up against the liquor business.

It is admitted that a prohibition law is the most difficult of all laws to enforce, even when a majority of men in a State vote for it. What chances would there be for the enforcement of such a law if the majority of men were against prohibition and such a law was enacted by women's votes. Four woman-suffrage States voted prohibition in 1914, but California, a suffrage State, with nearly as large a population as all four woman-suffrage States, with nearly as large a population as all four woman-suffrage States, with nearly as large a population as all four woman-suffrage States that adolshed the ilquor traffic), voted overwhelmingly against prohibition.

South Dakota, Nebraska, and Michigan adopted prohibition by men's votes November 7, 1916, while on the same day, California, with women and men voting, defeated the measure by 101,561 majority.

The liquor dealers certainly have nothing to fear

SCHOOLS AND PLAYGROUNDS.

Fifteen States have adopted prohibition by men's votes.

SCHOOLS AND PLAYGEOUNDS.

Suffragists tell us on all occasions that if women had the ballot much better laws for the education and welfare of the child and youth of our country will be enacted. Let us cite a few instances to disprove such a theory.

At Berkeley, Cal., April 12, 1913, for the issuance of bonds for playgrounds, which were defeated, only about 1,500 of the 8,000 women of the city voted. The mayor, who had been a zealous worker for woman suffrage, reprimanded the women for their negligence of this particular issue, which of all others should interest them. In a newspaper article he asks. "Where were the mothers?" Berkeley had 1,301 more women than men over 21 years of age in 1910 (letter of Feb. 28, 1911, Director of Census.)

At Pasadena, Cal., where there were 2,688 more women than men of voting age, the playgrounds that were the pride of Pasadena and were established before women had the ballot were discontinued in July, 1913, on account of the failure of the voters to vote money for the purchase of the grounds. (Los Angeles Times, July 27, 1913)

At an election November 12, 1913, Pasadena, Cal., failed to vote bonds to repair leaky roofs and make sanitary repairs on schoolhouses, to complete new schoolhouses under construction, and to make it possible to provide schools for the entire school year. The superintendent of schools said the school year would have to be cut a month or two, and that some schools would have to close when the rains began. (Los Angeles Times, Nov. 13, 1913.)

It happened to rain November 12 in Pasadena, and some thought the bonds might have carried had the vote been taken on a fair day when the ladies could more conveniently get to the polls, so it was decided to have another election to vote for bonds in a less amount than was voted on November 12. So on January 16, 1914, a fair day, another election was held, and the bonds were again defeated. So the voters of Pasadena decided at two elections that the repair of Wice not suppressed where women vote.

Much has been said by suffragists about the recall of the mayor of Seattle, who has since been renominated and reelected, and the abolishing of the Barbary Coast, San Francisco. Mayor Harper was recalled in Los Angeles about four years before women voted on account of not enforcing laws against vice, and more than 50 cities in the country have abolished segregated vice districts in the past four years. Los Angeles abolished the segregated district about six years before women had the ballot, but it took Denver nearly 20 years after women voted to do away with its segregated vice district. An abatement law was passed in the District of Columbia by men, and such a law has been passed or is pending in several male suffrage States. The Barbary Coast was again established in San Francisco, which is one of the last big cities in the United States where a segregated vice district yet exists. January 27, 1917, the mayor announced he would appoint 25 leading citizens to investigate conditions. The law enforcement league, the chamber of commerce, ministers, and women's clubs are working to stamp out vice in San Francisco. It seems that "votes for women fall to bring reforms, and that the old way—law enforcement leagues, business men's organizations, ministers, and women's clubs had to be summoned. Chicago, where women vote, also has its scandal. Charges are being made that money is being collected for protection of vice resorts and gambling houses.

Denver Post, October 17, 1913, report of Mrs. Stewart Walling and Dr. Elizabeth Cassidy: "Colorado Reformatory rotten. Nothing but fifth and graft found at Buena Vista. Merely a preparatory school for the penitentiary. The reformatory, submerged in politics, is a monument to graft, ignorance, stupidity, extravagance, and mismanagement. Building so infested with vermin that only fire could purify it."

The Daily News, of Denver, of October 13, 1913, says the Rev. A. E. Shattuck, of Grand Junction, has stirred up the animals in fine shape

WAR AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Was And Woman Suffrages.

Suffragists continually tell us that if women had the ballot wars and internal strife would be a thing of the past, yet Colorado, which has had woman suffrage for nearly a generation, was in the throes of civil war nearly all of 1914. The State had become so weakened in its fabric that it could not keep order and protect life and property within its borders, but was compelled, through the State authorities, to call upon the President of the United States to send Government troops to administer affairs and bring order out of chaos. This is another proof of the failure of woman suffrage in the model State of Colorado, and refutes beyond any possibility of controversy the suffragists' claim.

The European war and our break with Germany came suddenly, and, as with most wars, there was no time for men to vote whether war should or should not be declared. Should a foreign foe invade our country and the women of our land vote to offer no resistance, but decide to surrender our liberty and property and submit to the yoke of a foreign despot rather than consent to the men defending our homes and firesides by going to war, and the men of our Nation decide to fight for the honor and well-being of our country, how could the women prevent them? Would it be right for women to vote that our men should not defend our homes and country? On the other hand, would it be just and right for the women of our country to vote that our men should not defend our homes and country? On the other hand, would it be just and right for the women of our country to vote that our men should go to war when the women would be unable to do their share of the fighting?

WAGE-EARNING WOMEN AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

It has been sald that women working in stores and factories need the ballot to increase their wages and for bettering their condition generally. Of the 8,075,773 female workers over 10 years of age, only 4,436,804 are employed outside their home and home farms; 1,346,905 are under 21 years of age, leaving only 3,088,899 to vote—only about one-eighth of the women of voting age in the United States, there being many times more workingmen than working women in the country. Why have not men increased their wages by the ballot, as men have had the ballot for over 100 years? If the ballot can increase wages and produce wealth and make equal pay for equal work, why do different wage scales obtain in different parts of this country, and why do laboring men rely on labor unions instead of the ballot for better wages and working conditions?

The main reason for lower wages for women, aside from the physical difference, which the ballot can not change, is that women are only temporary wage earners, about seven years being the average length of time which women engage in wage-earning occupations; after which they graduate into matrimony, their natural sphere, which is the expectation of every normal woman.

As there are over 20,000,000 women of voting age not employed as wage earners, what chance would 3,988,399 working women have in a contest of votes, with 20,000,000 women not so engaged and about 27,000,000 men voters besides? The first "mothers' pension law," the first "workmen's compensation law." the first "mothers' pension law," the first "workmen's compensation law." the first "mothers' pension law," the first "workmen's compensation law." the first "mothers' pension law," the first "workmen's compensation law." the first "mothers' pension law," the first "workmen's compensation law." the first "mothers' pension law," the first "mothers' pension law," the first is acknowledged that Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Nebraska, Missouri, Pennsylvania, New York and Mas

States in this regard.

Judge Lindsey, in an address in Denver in 1915, said; "We are 20 years behind Massachusetts in spite of suffrage."

At an election November 3, 1914, California defeated an 8-hour law and 48 hours per week; and Oregon defeated an 8-hour day and room-ventilation law for women by a large majority.

In most States where men make the laws a woman can desert her husband and all he can do is to ask her to return to him, while men can be arrested and imprisoned for deserting their wives. In many male-suffrage States women can sell and convey their real estate without the husband signing the deed, while men must have their wives' signatures in order to sell and convey their own lands.

Women acting as nonpartisans without the vote will get more favorable legislation and better laws of every kind enacted than as partisans with the vote.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE UNDEMOCRATIC.

Woman suffrage is undemocratic: First, because the leaders will not leave the question to the women to decide, but would have the men force suffrage on women, 80 per cent of whom do not want the ballot. Second, as has been proven beyond a doubt, which anyone can verify by United States Census and secretaries of states' reports, women will not vote, relatively as generally as men of the different classes, and can never do so, however much they might desire to on account of their duty of motherhood; consequently, the will of the majority is often set aside and defeated where women vote, and the political status of both men and women changed, and laws representing the will of the minority enacted. This is one of the great injustices of woman suffrage, for laws representing the will of the minority are dangerous to our free institutions. Third, as the Father of our Country truly said, "Government without force is a nullity," and is not just nor democratic for women to vote laws unless they can fulfill all the functions of government. As they can not serve in the Army and Navy, assist the officers in arresting criminals and putting down riots, etc., it can not be said they have a right to vote laws which they can not enforce and which would not be enforced unless the men of the country desired they should be.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE NOT AN INHERENT RIGHT.

not enforce and which would not be enforced unless the men of the country desired they should be.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE NOT AN INHERENT RIGHT.

"The granting of the franchise," said Chief Justice Marshall, "has always been regarded in the practice of nations as a matter of expedience, and not as inherent right."

If it is a right for all to vote who pay taxes and who live under laws they must obey, then all State laws preventing Chinese, United States soldiers, and illiterate men from voting should be repealed. Also laws for punishing boys for crimes or taxing their property should be abolished, as boys have no voice in making the laws of the land till they reach the age of 21 years. Yet who would say that the laws pertaining to the youth of our land are unfair or unjust, or who would say that the illiterate man is living under unjust laws in the many States where he is not allowed a voice in the making of them? Hilterate men, Chinese, and boys under 21 are people, and are not allowed to vote; and it is not now and never has been considered expedient for all people to use the franchise. Only when the interests of all the people—men, women, and children—are best served by granting the franchise to anyone is voting a right, as suffrage is a political and not a natural or inherent right, but entirely a matter of expediency. The women of the suffrage States might say that as men had always held the offices for the enforcement of laws against crimes, such as train robbing, etc., that it was a right for women to be placed in these offices; but who would say that women could arrest criminals and enforce the laws as well as men? And as they could not, who would say it was a right they should be given such offices? The same is true of voting. As women only perform the duty of voting to a much less degree than men, and thereby the will of the people is not as well expressed at the polls, it can not be a right, nor is it justice, for women to vote.

We believe that you will agree with us that the main object of voting pressed at the polls, it can not be a right, and to vote.

We believe that you will agree with us that the main object of voting is to register the will of the majority; that it may be crystallized into the law of the land; that any propaganda that tends to and does, in some instances, defeat the will of the majority is inimical to our form of government.

We believe that you will agree with us that the main object of voting is to register the will of the majority; that it may be crystallized into the law of the land; that any propaganda that tends to and does, in some instances, defeat the will of the majority is inimical to our form of government.

We think, from the instances cited, we have shown beyond question that women given the ballot do not vote as generally as men. When a man votes in a male-suffrage State his vote counts one, but in a woman suffrage State, unless his wife votes, his vote counts one-half. If a single man, if the women of his class do not vote relatively as generally as men of his class and opinions, his vote is of less effect than if women were not enfranchised. The fact that the different classes of women do not vote relatively in so large a proportion as men of the different classes in the suffrage States tends to, and in many instances does, defeat the will of the majority; and the registration of the will of the majority as men, where they have been given the ballot, in many cases cause laws to be enacted that are the will of the minority, and that is one of the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many in the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, for the laws made by many interests of the greatest injustices of woman suffrage, we have a large majority for woman suffrage, only a greatest injustices of woman suffrage, only 35.5 per cent of the m

WOMEN AS OFFICE SEEKERS.

Suffragists have said that women only want the ballot to protect themselves, their children, and their property. Yet when we consider that 255 women were candidates for county offices in Kansas last November and 151 were elected, we are compelled to believe that the desire to hold office is one of the chief reasons for the agitation for November and the control office is one of the chief reasons to the vote.

Umatilia, Oreg., has all the city offices filled by women, and all the suffrage States have women officeholders, Montana having elected a woman to Congress last November.

Another example of the harmful effect of giving women the ballot is the fact that woman suffrage would decrease the power in politics of that great independent vote of the rural communities, where reside the larger part of our population, and add to the power of the boss-controlled city vote. Since the number of males to females in the rural part of our Nation is 109.9 males to 100 females, while in our city population the number of males is only 101.7 to 100 females. (See pp. 276 and 334, vol. 1, U. S. Census 1910.) Besides, the women rural voters, living farther from the polling places than the city women, who reside only a few blocks from where they cast their ballots, would not and could not vote in as large a proportion as their city sisters. It not being convenient or possible for as large a per cent of women in the country districts to go to the polls, as the men, the power of the pollitical machine in the cities (where the large foreign-born population reside) would be greatly increased, for the country women's vote would not offset the city women's vote offsets the city men's vote. The political bosses in Chicago and other cities where women have been permitted to vote have been shorn of none of their power by women entering politics. Also in our big cities, where the liquor interests are large, the saloons, brewerles, hotels, and cafés that sell liquor, property owners who rent property to such interest, and all ailied trades and business, as well as gamblers, etc., see that their women go to the polls on election day nearly as a unit, besides inducing their women friends to vote, it being to their interest financially to do so, while women with no monetary interests in the election would fail to vote as generally as men of their class and opinions do. So the will of the majority in such an election may often be defeated, and liquor interests win; while if men alone voted, the saloon might be abolished. As before mentioned, when men alone voted no local option in Los Angeles the saloon won by two to o gain advantage and defeat the will of the majority.

WOMEN AS JURORS IN WOMAN-SUFFRAGE STATES.

The Washington Post of September 21, 1916, contains a dispatch from Reno, Nev., about a divorce case, which says in part: "A jury, consisting partly of women, of whom three are married, one single, and two widows, the other six jurors being men. " The case, which will probably occupy several weeks, is being tried behind closed doors, as the attorneys claim the evidence is unfit for public hearing." Mr. Voter, how would you like to have your wife, mother, sister, or daughter on a jury with men for several days or weeks to hear evidence unfit for the public to hear? That is just what you may expect if woman suffrage is sopted.

unfit for the public to hear? That is just what you may expect if woman suffrage is sopted.

FEMINISM AND SOCIALISM.

According to Mrs. Beatrice Forbes-Robinson Hale, noted suffrage speaker and writer, woman suffrage is "an essential branch of the tree of feminism." "Feminism," she says in her book on the subject, "is gradually supplying to women the things they most need." Among these things she mentions "easy divorce" and "economic independence." Feminism is 'variously defined, but in whatever guise of words we find it we see the same earmarks of revolt against nature and Christian morals. The feminist is an avowed enemy of the home. Writing in McClure's Magazine for March, 1913, Inez Milholland Boissevain, a prominent suffragist, foresees with delight "the beginning of a breakdown to the artificial barriers in the way of a more natural observance of the mating instinct." in other words, "free love."

The Case for Woman Suffrage, a bibliography of suffrage literature, published by the College Equal Suffrage League, and sold by the National Woman Suffrage Association, sneers at the "old-fashioned" suffrage arguments and gives the highest meed of praise to the radical writings of the most radical feminists and socialists. "Too many advocates of woman suffrage," says the Case (p. 64), "insist that when woman is enfranchised she will be no less 'womanly' than before; whereas in point of fact perhaps the chief thing to be said for the suffrage is precisely that it would make woman less womanly in the commonly accepted sense of the term. One can not argue logically on woman suffrage wrthout facing this fact."

The devotees of feminism talk gibly and coarsely about "sex freedom" and "sex independence for women," all to be achieved with the vote. "Economic independence for women," all to be achieved with the vote. "Economic independence for women," all to be achieved with the vote. "Economic independence for women," all to be achieved with the vote. "Economic independence for women," all to be achieved with the vote.

printed and circulated as a campaign document by the National Woman Suffrage Association.

Charlotte Perkins Gilman, leading suffrage speaker and writer, in an article in the Woman's Journal, the suffrage organ edited by the president of the Massachusetts Suffrage Association, says:

"The woman should have as much to do in the home as the manno more. Who, then, will take care of a sick baby? The nurse, of course. If the child is not seriously ill, the nurse is as good as the mother. If the child is seriously ill, the nurse is as good as the mother. If the child is no more holy than the post office.

Mary Ware Dennett says it is unwholesome for any woman to be supported by any man. Mrs. Dennett was formerly an officer of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, later an officer of the National Woman Suffrage Association. Under this theory of economic independence for women the husband must cease to be the provider, and the wife must cease to be the home maker; otherwise their relations are anwholesome.

In the suffrage parade in Washington, D. C., March 3, 1913, was carried a large banner with the inscription, "1,000,000 Socialists work and vote for woman suffrage." There is no getting away from the fact that woman suffrage, feminism, and socialism are indissolubly linked. Socialists like the late Inez Mitholland Boissevain, Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, Alice Stone Blackwell, and Miss Jessie Ashley are prominent leaders in the Woman Suffrage Party. Socialists favor woman suffrage because they know what it means to their cause. Where do you stand? Are you in favor of it? Do you care to have private property abolished? Do you believe that wifehood is slavery? Do you think homes should be abandoned in order that women may have economic independence? If you want these things, work for woman suffrage with the feminists and Socialists; but if you hold your family relations, your home, your religion sacred, if you desire to preserve them for yourself and your children for all time, then work with all your might against the companions, the handmalds, the forerunners of feminism and socialism-woman suffrage,

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AND DIVORCE

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AND DIVORCE.

It has been said that there was no connection between votes for women and divorce, yet it is significant that in the 11 States where the sentiment was favorable to woman suffrage (Wyoming, Idaho, California, Utah, Montana, Arizona, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, Colorado, and Kansas) there was, according to Marriage and Divorce, United States Census Bulletin No. 96, page 20, an average of 364 divorces per 100,000 of married population, while in the adjoining male-suffrage States west of the Mississippi River (Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and New Mexico) the average number of divorces was only 264 per 100,000, and for the United States as a whole only 200 per 100,000 of the married population.

WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS UNJUST.

WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS UNJUST.

The suffragists say they demand justice for women in demanding the ballot for women; but for which women—the 20 per cent who demand it or the 80 per cent of the women who protest or who are silent on the question? Should 80 per cent of the women be compelled to bow to the will of 20 per cent? We are entirely unable to understand how anyone can claim that women have the right to vote and deny, as the suffragists do, that women have the right to vote on the question as to whether or not they want the ballot. Abstract of census, 1910, page 107, shows there were in the United States 26,999,154 men and 24,555,754 women 21 years of age and over. So if women were given the ballot they could not, if they desired to do so, vote any laws that the men opposed.

We deny the allegation of the suffragists that the men of this Nation have made a failure of government, or that men have become such "mollycoddles" or so weak that it is necessary to place the burden of government upon women, most of whom are opposed to having the additional responsibility imposed upon them. It is an insult to the men of this country to be told by the suffragists that they can not be trusted to make just laws for women and children, when an average of four-fifths of the earnings of the man, over and above the necessities of the family, are spent on the women and children. Suffragists often quote the praise given woman suffrage by politicians from States where women have the franchise would condemn woman suffrage, as the loss of a few votes of the agitating class of women, or even one vote to a politician, might mean the loss of a big-paying office.

If woman could ever vote as generally as men, there would be little or even one vote to a politician, might mean the loss of a big-paying office.

If woman could ever vote as generally as men, there would be little or no change in our laws; for if even once in a while a wife voted in opposition to her husband and canceled his vote—in which event the family would have no voice in the laws at all—the final result of the whole vote would rarely be changed, and we would have the absurd spectacle of two people doing what one alone could accomplish as well and waste all the effort expended in the study of politics by women and the enormous expense the doubling the vote would entail.

The foundation of every government is the family, and the large majority of men and women of voting age are married. If a wife voted in opposition to her husband there would be no necessity for either to vote, while if they voted alike her vote would be useless.

Our Government is in part one great business concern; and what business man or manufacturer would not consider a proposition childish to use for part of his work double the number of people at double the cost to do something which would be of absolutely no profit? Yet it has been proven that suffrage does not better conditions or laws, and still suffragists ask men to give women the ballot when it would almost double the cost of elections and nearly double the number of people to do the voting, with no good whatever accomplished.

POPULATION NOT TERRITORY COUNTS.

POPULATION NOT TERRITORY COUNTS.

In the 11 full suffrage States, Kansas, Moutana, Oregon, Washington, California, Arlzona, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, Wyoming, and Colorado, the total number of women of voting age was 2,097,945 (census, 1910), which is 16,063 less women of voting age than reside in the State of Pennsylvania.

HIGH COST OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Under caption "What freaks do to California," the Los Angeles Times of September 26, 1914, prints, in a dispatch from Sacramento: "California citizens will pay approximately $1,637,500 for the privilege of exercising the right of suffrage this year. This is an increase of 1335 per cent since 1910." Above amount is exclusive of city, county, and special elections. Women were given the ballot in California October 10, 1911. California also has the highest government cost per capita of any State in the Union.

In Chicago in 1913 (the year before women were given partial suffrage), the cost of elections was $386,954, but in 1917 the election board asks for $1,305,000. Votes for women will increase taxes for it costs money to hold elections and if you provide 50 or 100 per cent more polling places the expense is bound to be greater. Chicago has double the number of polling places it had before women voted.

DEFEATS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

In the past four years 13 States have by overwhelming majorities in most instances voted against giving the ballot to women, viz: Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Iowa, and West Virginia. Five of the above States defeated woman suffrage in 1914, the four States of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts in 1915, and the three States of Iowa, West Virginia, and South Dakota in 1916. These 13 States that defeated votes for women have a population (census, 1910) of 41,685,845. Add to these the 12 Southern States whose hostility to woman suffrage is well known: Virginia North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Lousiana, Oklahoma, and Texas, we have the States with a population of 65,735,414, known to be strongly opposed to the franchise for women, or States in which reside 71.4 per cent of the population of this Nation. In addition there are the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Indiana, New Mexico, and Minnesota, in all of which there has never been enough suffrage sentiment to get the legislatures to submit the question to the voters, therefore the States which contain about 84 per cent of the population of this country are decidedly against "votes for women." The wave of hysteria is passing and instead of the sentiment for woman suffrage increasing, it is on the decline, as shown by the vote in Michigan, where it was defeated in 1912 by only 760 majority and in 1913 by 96,144. In Ohio in 1912 "votes for women" was defeated by 87,455 majority and in 1914 by 182,905. In Massachusetts in 1915 the majority against giving women the ballot was 133,447, the largest majority ever given against men or measures in that State. In 1916 West Virginia voted nearly three to one against giving women the franchise. Woman suffrage is going—not coming.

The more women go out into the rough world to do men's work the greater the loss to the home and the more she loses her delicate charm and sympathy, which is distinctly feminine; and, in the language of the late Senator Vest, of Missouri, "What man would care to go home after the struggle and worry of the day in the business world and fall into the arms of a constitutional lawyer or politician for rest, consolation, and comfort?"

OPINIONS OF EMINENT MEN AGAINST WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT MEN AGAINST WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Thomas Jefferson: "Nature has marked the weaker sex for protection, rather than the direction of government."

Daniel Webster: "It is by the promulgation of sound morals in the community, and more especially by the training and instruction of the young that woman performs her part toward the preservation of a free government."

The Hon. Elihu Root, United States Senator: "I am opposed to granting suffrage to women because I believe it would be a loss to women and an injury to the State. * * It is a fatal mistake that these excellent women make when they conceive that the functions of men are superior to theirs and seek to usurp them."

Grover Cleveland: "I am willing to admit it was only after a more thorough appreciation of what female suffrage really means that I became fully convinced that its inauguration would vastly increase the unhappy imperfections and shortcomings of our present manvoting suffrage, its especial susceptibility to bad leadership and other hurtful influences would constitute it another menacing condition to those which already vex and disturb the deliberate and intelligent expression of the popular will."

William Howard Taft: "If in any of the States now acting on the question I were called upon to vote, I would vote against giving the suffrage, because I think, to force it upon an unwilling or indifferent majority * * * is to add to the electorate an element that will not improve its governing capacity."

Rev Lyman Abbott, D. D.: "If any man attempts woman's functions he will prove himself but an inferior woman. If woman attempts man's functions, she will prove herself an inferior man. Some masculine women there are; some feminine men there are. These are the monstrosities of nature."

Bishop John H. Vincent (founder of the chautauqua): "When about 30 years of age I accepted for a time the doctrine of woman suffrage and publicly defended it, Years of wide and careful observation have convinced me that the demand for woman suffrage in Amer

The greatest political triumphs she would achieve in public life fade into insignificance compared with the serene glory which radiates from the domestic shrine and which she illuminates and warms by her conjugal and motherly virtues."

OFFENSES AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate pro ceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the bill (S. 8148) to define and punish espionage.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish my colleage to advise the Senate how long, in his judgment, it will require to finish the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. In answer to my colleague I desire to say that there are some 8 or 10 amendments to the bill. I do not think they will take a great deal of time. How many more amendments will be offered I do not know, but we ought to finish the bill by 3 or 4 o'clock, and in even less time than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire further of my col-league if the bill is not finished by the usual hour for adjournment, say at 6 o'clock, is it his purpose to have a night session?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to go on without even a recess and finish the bill to-night, but if we must take a recess that it be taken until 8 o'clock and that we come back and finish it to-night.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons] if it is his intention to call up the revenue bill after this bill has been disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, that is the purpose of my inquiry. I had expected that the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the bill this morning, but my colleague advised me late Sat-urday evening that he thought probably it would take only a short time this morning to dispose of the unfinished business. In view of that I am not disposed to ask that the revenue bill shall be taken up until the pending bill has been completed, unless it is likely to take a very considerable time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President— Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], I should like to say that I have arranged with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to bring up at 4 o'clock this afternoon a motion to make a special order of the bill increasing the Interstate Commerce Commission and permitting its division into three divisions so as to facilitate the business of that commission. It was my idea to ask that it be made a special order for this evening or to-morrow evening. I ask the Senator, taking into consideration, of course, the urgency of the measure which he is presenting and the urgency of the legislation I have in view, whether he can not arrange to have either to-night or to-morrow night given for the consideration of the Interstate Commerce bill. I give notice that at 4 o'clock I will bring up this

Mr. THOMAS. My colleague [Mr. Shafroth] is absent, and in his behalf I wish to give notice that the Porto Rican bill wili be pressed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want by my silence to lend myself to any false impression that might prevail in the Chamber. I do not intend to unduly delay final action upon the bill which is the unfinished business, but it can not be finished, in my opinion, within two or three hours. I have before me and I shall present some 14 or 15 amendments to the bill, all of which I believe to be important.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator intend to discuss each one of the amendments?

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be necessary to explain at least each one of them as I offer them. There may be other amendments, and doubtless will be. I will facilitate the consideration of the bill in every way I can, but there are some things in it which must either come out or there will be very considerable debate upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not mean that as a threat?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. I am simply uttering a prophecy; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course I understand if the Senator from Iowa is going to offer 14 amendments and address himself to each of them the probabilities are that we shall not get through with the bill before midnight. What I desired to say, and all I desire at this time to say, is that I shall be disposed on to-morrow to ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the revenue bill. I trust that we may be enabled either during the afternoon or at the night session to dispose of the measure now before the Senate, because I regard it as a very important matter, and one that should be acted upon. For that reason I have decided that I would not, as I formerly intended, ask the Senate to take up the revenue bill to-day unless the unfinished business should be disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 8148) to define and punish espionage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment proposed by the committee to insert an entire bill upon the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN'

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the proposed amendment be stated.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is what is known as the 14 chapters.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon of the Chair. I thought it was the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina on Saturday concerning some details in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Those were adopted. Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina advises me that those amendments were adopted. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 1 of the proposed amendment strike out of lines 4 and 5 the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled" and insert "in violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the United States," so that when amended the section will read:

Sec. 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense in violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the United States, approaches, goes upon, or enters, files over, or induces or aids another, etc.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I regard this as a grave piece of legislation, affecting the liberties of the people of this country, and I think Senators ought to hear what is said on the subject. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators aneration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may be permitted, Mr. President, to restate my general attitude toward the legislation under consid-

I recognize that there are weaknesses in our law on the subject covered by the substitute to the pending bill offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and I shall be glad to join in an effort to strengthen within proper limits those weaknesses of the law; but I can not concur in legislation which makes criminal things that all of us do every day of our lives, and which will impose criminal penalties upon a very large proportion of the American people if the law is enforced.

I intend to offer a series of amendments to the bill, as at present advised, 14 or 15 in number. If all of them are adopted, the measure will still be an exceedingly stringent regulation of American life, a regulation which I venture to say is more arbitrary, more rigorous than any country on the face of the earth ever adopted in time of peace. I say this because I do not want to have it supposed that I am endeavoring to deprive the Government of any reasonable weapon for the national de-

The amendment which I have just sent to the Secretary's desk, being the first of the series, proposes to strike out, in chapter 1, section 1, page 1, in lines 4 and 5, the words "to chapter 1, section 1, page 1, in lines 4 and 5, the words which he is not lawfully entitled," and to substitute for them the words "in violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the United States."

In order that the significance of the amendment may be fully appreciated, I must repeat very briefly my comment upon this part of the section made on Saturday last.

As it is now before us, the section proposes this:

Certain places that cover the entire military operations of the United States and all other places which may be designated by the President. I remarked on Saturday, and reflection has simply deepened my conviction, that it is utterly impossible for any man, however well trained he may be in the law, to determine whether he is or is not lawfully entitled to the information which he may seek. There is no statute now upon the subject; there is no order of any executive officer upon the subject, except as such orders have been made in recent days, covering certain offices and certain places in which our military work is being conducted. I have no objection to such an order, and any man who disobeys the order, who enters any of the places, entrance to which has been forbidden by the President of the United States, in order to secure information, however innocent he may be in his desire to use the information, ought to be punished, for I am a respecter of law and authority. I desire is that before I become a criminal, I may be advised and informed of the mandates of the law, so that an innocent act may not be turned into a criminal act, without any intent whatsoever.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from California. Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator whether, independently of any order of some constituted officer, every American citizen has not the lawful right to inquire into the affairs of government, including our national defense?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think he has; and it will be observed that my amendment proceeds upon that theory. My amendment

That, whoever for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense in violation of a statute or in violation of a lawful order of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], in passing, says "and published in the newspapers." Well, wherever it may be published, the people of this country have a right to know what is being done by their officers. defending the newspapers, because just now I think the way in which the newspapers of this country are being conducted is perfectly outrageous; but I insist that every American citizen has the right to know what is going on in this country, if this is a Government of the people.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from California. I do not want to have it supposed or believed that if these amendments are adopted the law is one that would meet the approval of an unprejudiced patriot; but we have the bill before us, and I am trying, as best I can, to eliminate its most objectionable parts, and I think that I meet in my amendment the view of the Senator from California, because it would be then provided that if the citizen does any of these things in violation of the statute-and we may assume that Congress will not pass an unconstitutional statute-or if he does it in violation of a lawful order of the President, then he becomes amenable to the penalties of the paragraph. The people of this country are entitled to that protection. They are entitled to know within reasonable limits and with reasonable certainty what they may and may not do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, does the order of the President become a law except in time of war? Does the Senator's amendment give the President authority to write a law just by proclaiming a rule?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment that I am now considering does not give the President any authority; it simply recognizes the authority he has under the law. I am not very sure about my opinion on that point; but I assume, for instance, that the President's order issued the other day, excluding visitors from the War and Navy Departments or offices, except when provided with a pass or with some other form of credential, is a lawful order. I do not know but I assume it is within his power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. But however that may be, I do not attempt, in my amendment, to decide the question. All I ask is that a man shall not become criminal when he is seeking this information unless, in entering upon the premises or in approaching the premises, whatever they may be, he is violating either a statute which has been passed by Congress or a lawful order of the President.

I submit, Senators, that we can not do less than is provided in my amendment. Is it possible that we have reached a time when we are willing to subject the people of this country to the risks, the hazards of the arbitrary will of a prosecuting officer, and put upon the citizen the onus of discovering whether he is or is not lawfully entitled to the information he seeks, without a word in the law defining his rights, without a word in any order that may be issued by the Executive prescribing his rights or forbidding him to do the thing which he is doing?

I can not understand the state of mind which proposes any such legislation as this paragraph presents. I am sure that the Senator from North Carolina will agree with me that every instance that has been mentioned in the Senate during the consideration of this bill as being an instance in which it was desirable to punish the offender will be within the statute as it would be if my amendment were adopted. I challenge any Senator to give any instance in which a guilty man could escape even if every amendment which I present shall be adopted. I have attempted in this amendment simply to exclude the operation of the law in bringing within this great net persons who are innocent of every moral offense and innocent of any intent whatsoever either to violate the law or to injure their country.

I have the most earnest hope that the Senator from North Carolina, in charge of the bill, will see the propriety, the wisdom of accepting, in so far as he can, this amendment; and what I have said about it applies with equal force to all the amendments I shall offer.

In order that those who are here now who were not here when it was read may hear the amendment, I ask that it be stated from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. It is proposed to strike out of lines 4 and 5 the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled" and insert " violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that it be read as it would read with the amendment adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as re-

The Secretary read as follows:

That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense—

Mr. CUMMINS. I will read it, because I understand its connection, probably, better than the Secretary.

The SECRETARY (continuing)- in violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the United States, approaches, goes upon, or enters, files over, or induces or aids another to approach, etc.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is sufficient.

Mr. OVERMAN. "Whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense in violation of a statute or a lawful order of the President of the United States, approaches, goes upon," and so forth; that is the way it will read.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; that is correct. Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator is seeing ghosts. I want to say to him that every single, solitary one of the extreme cases that he has cited here is of a kind for which no man would ever be prosecuted or punished.

Why, take the case he talks about—the poor woman going up to the Navy Department and inquiring about her son, because she wants to know when the Army is coming back, and all that sort of thing, for which, it is asserted, she would be liable to punishment under this bill. Does the Senator think any district attorney would ever present a bill, or anybody would ever file a complaint, or anything would be done about that?

The trouble about it is that you limit us here to a statute when we have no statutes upon this subject. That is the trouble. We have no law on the subject. This Nation is the weakest nation on earth in that respect. Why, the Attorney General has had men out to try to enforce the neutrality laws, and we have no laws to enforce. He has had cases, and these bills are gotten up to meet cases, where the law is not only deficient but we absolutely have no law.

Now, what does this provide?
"Whoever goes upon or approaches"—for what? "For the purpose "—that is what it says—for the purpose of what? "For the purpose of obtaining information." What business has any citizen of the United States going in or upon the radio stations or the naval stations or into the great war-defense stations of the United States for the purpose of getting information? The Senator from Iowa would not do it without some authority.

Mr. CUMMINS. But, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, this bill is not limited to radio stations and docks and arsenals, which can be covered, of course, by an Executive order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, Mr. President, it names the places, and everything that is named here has reference to the national defense.

Mr. CUMMINS. It names them, and names everything else in the country at the same time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, Mr. President, let us see what it names. "Whoever * * * goes upon * * * for the purpose of "Whoever * * * goes upon * * * for the purpose of obtaining information," and so forth, "shall be punished." That is what he goes for. He goes as a spy. That is what this bill is for—to punish spies. I want to say that this bill is not nearly as drastic as it was when it came to us, because it did make them spies in many instances, and we struck it out. It is not as drastic as any law upon this subject adopted by any other country. This is a Republic, as the Senator has said. We have not gone as far as some other countries, but we have considered this matter, and, as the great Senator from Utah [Mr. Sutherland] said in reply to the Senator from Iowa, this matter is covered by using the words "not lawfully entitled." That means against any statute of the United States or against any rule or regulation prescribed

Now the Senator wants to limit us to a statute. We will have to go to work here and pass a thousand statutes or more if you limit it to that. This language is general. It does not particularize. Any man who goes in and on and approaches the places named for the purpose of obtaining information on these matters is punishable under this law. What business has any man to go, without lawful authority, in and upon our nationaldefense stations for the purpose of getting information? Why, there is no American citizen who needs to have the information unless he goes by lawful authority; and if he goes without lawful authority he ought to be punished, because he goes for the purpose of giving the information to an enemy.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be voted down, for I see no need of it. Why, Senators, we had this matter considered by two of the ablest Senators on that side, two as able lawyers as there are in the United States, and we had lawyers on this side as able as any in the United States, and they say that this expression, "without lawful authority," is sufficient to protect the innocent man. I tell you here and now that any innocent man in the cases cited will be protected. You have got to leave some discretion in the district attorney. Nobody will file a complaint in a perfectly innocent case, like that of the woman going up here to the War Department. is one of the extreme cases that some great lawyer like my friend here can find to cite. As a matter of fact, it is impossible to punish her. No district attorney, as I say, would file a bill against her; no man would file a complaint, and no jury would convict her.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will allow me, I desire to correct one statement. I did not bring forward the instance about the widow or the mother going to the Secretary of War.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator did not, but it was

Mr. CUMMINS. That was brought forward by one of these great lawyers—and he is a very great lawyer—to whom the Senator from North Carolina referred, namely, the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh]. He said that this law would cover just such a case as that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not agree with him; and he is opposed to this amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Therefore, Mr. President, I do not see why it is not covered; and the innocent will be protected. This is intended in order to protect our Government against spies. Why, there are 100,000 spies in this country to-day, I am told, and more. Are we to have no law in this country to protect our naval stations, our marine and submarine bases, our dockyards, our canals, our arsenals, our factories, our mines, our telegraph stations, our wireless stations? That is all that is mentioned in this chapter; and in others the prohibition is extended to whoever lawfully or unlawfully has possession of, access to, control over, or is intrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, and so forth-all applying to the national defense; in other words, our secrets in regard to the national defense. If he communicates it or transmits it, and so on, he ought to be punished. A man ought to be punished if he has these things in his possession and communicates them to the enemy or anybody else.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, as has been said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins], this bill did not originate in the Senate. It did not originate in the mind of any Senator. It came out of one of the executive departments of the Government fully formed, ready for enactment. It is shocking to me that any officer of the Government should even suggest, much less recommend, legislation of this kind. It absolutely closes the door against any inquiry or any effort to obtain information by any and every citizen of this country relating to our national defense.

If the Czar of Russia should ever see this legislation, if it becomes a law, he would turn green with envy at the extent to which the Government of the United States has gone to close the eyes and stop the ears of its citizens against any information as to what the Government is doing.

The Senator from North Carolina says that it only prohibits these things as a means of gaining information—not information obtained with any ulterior or improper motive, or in order that any improper use may be made of it, as in the case of a spy, for example. We are spending millions and millions of dollars for the national defense. The people of the country are compelled to bear that burden, and if any one of them or any body of them should undertake to obtain information as to whether that money is being properly expended as provided in the appropriations he would, under this proposed statute, be a criminal, subject to fine and imprisonment.

The question as to who would be lawfully entitled under this act to obtain information of that kind may be a matter of debate. It is entirely uncertain. Generally speaking, I suppose any American citizen would have the right to ask for information respecting any of the affairs of the Government, but I called attention on Saturday to the fact that another section of this chapter of the bill evidently shows that the intention is to confine it to officials, because in section 6 it is provided that persons other than officers and employees of the United States duly authorized shall not be entitled to do these things.

Mr. President, there may be occasions when it is absolutely necessary that the proceedings of the Government should be kept secret, not only in time of war but at other times of peril

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator passes from that point, I will say that it has been stated here several times that this is a bill sent down here by the department. want to repeat what I said on Saturday, that the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General did get together, and all of them appreciated our great weak-ness along this line; and they directed the Attorney General to draw up certain proposed statutes as recommendations to the Congress that it was imperative to have enacted into law. They sent them down in the nature of recommendations. not think the Senator intended to say that the bill we are now considering here is just as it came from the Attorney General or the Secretary of War. I am sure he did not mean to say that, because he knows that is not true. He was with us and helped to amend this section and amend it very materially.

Mr. WORKS. No; I did not say that, Mr. President. Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Senator did not intend to Mr. WORKS. This bill originated in one of the executive departments, however.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, of course; it was sent here as a recommendation.

Some changes have been made in it by the Judiciary Committee, I am glad to say; but with respect to this particular chapter, the Judiciary Committee has not made it any better. It is just as bad now, in the particular to which I have called attention, as it was when it came out of the office of the Attorney General.

As I was saying when I was interrupted, there are cases when it is perfectly proper that officers of the Government having the national defense in charge shall prevent information becoming That is necessarily true in time of war. There may be special occasions in time of peace when something of that kind may be properly done, but generally speaking, the condition of the country, whether it relates to the national defense or something else, ought not to be concealed from the people of the United States, and I protest against it.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa certainly would help that situation somewhat, because it would require in advance either that the Congress of the United States should forbid a certain thing by statute or that the President in the performance of his duty as President or as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States should issue some order preventing citizens from making inquiry and obtaining information about specific things. But this general provision, it seems to me, is perfectly unjustifiable and un-American.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have not been able to hear all that the Senator from Iowa has said in reference to his proposed amendment, but there are two or three things involved which are somewhat confusing to me. The committee uses the expression "to which he is not lawfully entitled," which would indicate that if there was no law on the subject no one would be entitled to information. The Senator's amendment states "in violation of a statute," which supposes that there is a statute. I do not understand that at present there is any law on that subject. The second provision of his amendment is "or a lawful order of the President of the United States." The query with me is, Can the President make an order prohibiting people from obtaining information which is prohibited in the committee pro-

I am thoroughly convinced that inasmuch as Congress has entered upon an extensive program of preparation it is wise that there should be some control over the bases of supplies, the munition factories and other institutions that are operated for the purposes of the Government in this war emergency. Therefore, I ask him-and I speak of this because I want the opinion of the Senator from Iowa in reference to the language of his amendment-first, does he agree that there is no statute now on the subject?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know of any statute forbidding any person from approaching or going upon the premises which are described.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There would be no violation of a statute if any individual did go on the premises described?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not unless we enacted a statute to prohibit it. Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that the President without any act of Congress could make a lawful order forbidding people from going on these premises?

Mr. CUMMINS. On some of them, yes; on others, no. I have no doubt the order which forbids visitors entering the office of the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or the navy yard, and all such other places connected with the Army and Navy, was a valid order, and that anyone who would enter such a place in view of that order for the purpose of securing information of the national defense would violate the provision as it would be if my amendment were adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that the President would have the authority to issue an order prohibiting an aviator from sailing over the forts, arsenals, and other war and naval stations mentioned in the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Forbidding a citizen of the United States?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Any person. Mr. CUMMINS. I rather think he would, although I am

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I were certain the Senator's provision would enable the President to issue an order for protecting these various things, I could see no objection to the Senator's amendment; but if it is intended that there shall be no statute and no possibility of issuing a lawful order to protect these various things, it seems to me we would make a very serious mistake if we failed to properly legislate. The reason that we have not done this in the past has been due to the fact that there has been no danger apprehended, but at the present time we are entering upon a very extensive program of preparation, and unless we protect from designing people these various institutions of ours, it seems to me, Congress would be derelict in the performance of its duty. But, I repeat, if I thought the President had the right to make this kind of an order I could see no objection to the amendment of the Senator from

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Michigan a question? Is he willing to forbid everybody from obtaining any information with regard to the national defense?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think that is the purpose of this provision. No; I would not be in favor of it. I think Congress has the right at any time to obtain information and to authorize people to obtain that information. It can pass a statute to correct any abuses that might be made by this statute. But the prohibition suggested by the Senator evidently is not the purpose of this proposed law.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair).

Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt the Senator from Michigan is right—that that is not the purpose of this bill—but I insist that that is the effect of it; and I should be glad if the Senator would give that pretty close attention, because that is the important question,

Mr. TOWNSEND. I certainly would not want to do that. If this provision was to be enforced technically for the purpose of preventing proper intelligence going to the people, of course I should very seriously object to it. I have done what I could do honorably to avert war, and I shall continue so to do; but I recognize the serious portents which threaten our Republic. At the same time I am going to the limit of my ability to provide for the adequate protection of my country against reasonably possible dangers and I want to surround our institutions of defense and preparation with such safeguards as would prevent their destruction by an enemy or anybody in the employ of an enemy. I would rather err on that side at this time, so far as that is concerned, knowing that Congress has power at any time to pass a statute to right an evil, than to leave the thing wide open without the proper protection.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to reply for a moment to the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Michigan. I think it is true that the President has the power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the military forces of the country, to exclude citizens from the places in which these operations are being carried on or places which are directly a part of our military preparation. The President has exercised that power already. I think he has wisely exercised it, and I have no quarrel with him; but I can not agree with the Senator from Michigan with respect to the necessity or wisdom of simply excluding all American citizens from all information concerning the national defense. I may be willing that our people shall know nothing about the Army, if that be the warlike notion at the present time; I may be willing that they shall not know the name of a single ship in the Navy, if that be necessary in order to make our Navy effective; but I am not willing that citizens shall be excluded from the broad field of public welfare which is connected with the national

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. OVERMAN. Did the Senator vote for the joint resolution of 1911?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know.

Mr. OVERMAN. The joint resolution for the protection of the national defense?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether I did or not. Mr. OVERMAN. The same language was used in the joint resolution of 1911, and no man was even punished or indicted under it. Congress passed the joint resolution in the same language that is employed here. The Senator did not complain then.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not complaining now.
Mr. OVERMAN. It reads, "That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense, to which he is not lawfully entitled, goes upon any vessel," and so

This was the act of 1911, 36 Revised Statutes, and all the hobgobblins the Senator has stirred up here never occurred under that act. Here is the joint resolution of 1911, and the Senator will see that that language was in it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me see it. The Senator asked me whether I voted for it. I do not know whether I did or not. My attention was not called to it. I venture to say, without any knowledge at all, that it is essentially different from the bill we now have before us, and either I will be confounded by reading it or the Senator from North Carolina will be overthrown, one of the two. I will read it:

That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense, to which he is not lawfully entitled, goes upon any vessel, or enters any navy yard, naval station, fort, battery, torpedo station, arsenal, camp, factory, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense, owned or constructed or in process of construction by the United States, or in the possession or under the control of the United States or any of its authorities or agents, and whether situated within the United States or in any place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

I have now read what is the equivalent of paragraph A in the act of 1911. I give no assent to the act of 1911, but it is so radically different from the proposed act that it ought not to be cited in its support.

Mr. OVERMAN. I cited it only to show that the very lan-guage the Senator complains of in this bill was employed in the joint resolution, that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean the entire language? Mr. OVERMAN. The language which is used and which the Senator wishes to strike out in this paragraph: "That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense, to which he is not lawfully entitled." That is what the Senator proposes to strike out from this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator confines his comparison to that? Mr. OVERMAN. Surely. Mr. CUMMINS. In that respect he is right, but there is a vast difference between such a law when applied to the ships and boats and camps and arsenals and docks and applied to the places which are authorized in this bill. Let us see. The Senator from North Carolina says he wants to exclude people from these places in which military preparations are going on. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Townsexn] says he wants to pre-vent people getting information and conveying it to an enemy. I do, too. I think a man who enters upon any place or approaches any place in this country that is even remotely connected with the national defense for the purpose of conveying that information to an enemy in time of war, or even conveying it, if you please-I will go that far-to a friendly nation in time of peace, ought to be punished; and in the former case ought to be punished with the greatest severity. I would be willing to attach to that crime a penalty that would only end with the natural life of the person convicted of the offense.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator? The Senator made a statement a little while ago to the effect that he did not agree with the Senator from Michigan, who would prevent our citizens from obtaining information. The Senator from Michigan never made any such statement. The Senator from Iowa asked me a question, and I told him no. I could not agree with him; that I did not think that was the intent of the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Michigan, why did not the persons who drew the law confine it to that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know why they did not, unless, I suppose, they did not imagine the point would be raised on it, because that is not the object of the statute, evidently. If it can be safeguarded, I would be very glad to have it done.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all I am trying to do, to safeguard it so that it will not be used to persecute men who are innocent of any desire to injure their country or to aid or abet an enemy.

Now, I point out, if I may be permitted to do it, the vast difference between the present law and the proposed paragraph. If the present paragraph is so drastic and adequate, why repeal it and substitute anything in its stead? There must be some difference between the law of 1911 and the proposed law, or we would not be engaged here in endeavoring to enact another.

This person who goes upon these places for the purpose of obtaining information will find that if he-approaches goes upon, or enters, files over, or induces or aids another to approach, go upon, enter, or fly over any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine hase, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station—

I pause there to say that I have no doubt the President has power to exclude citizens from approaching or entering upon these places, and therefore my amendment would not at all weaken the statute in so far as these places are concerned. Then it proceeds building, office, or other place connected with the national defense

I wonder if the Capitol is connected with the national defense? I wonder if the Capitor is connected with the national defense? I do not know what the judicial construction of the words "connected with the national defense" may be, but I take it there is a rather intimate connection between the Capitol and the national defense-owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States, or under the control of the United States, or of any of its officers or agents, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored under any contract or agreement with the United States.

This language extends the operation of the bill to every manufactory in the United States which has undertaken to construct anything for the United States in the nature of preparation for war. I read further:

Or with any person on behalf of the United States, or otherwise on behalf of the United States, or any prohibited place within the meaning of section 6 of this chapter.

Here is the part of the bill which is especially dangerous and objectionable, because I turn now to section 6, in order to inform those who are here and who were not here Saturday what other places the President may designate and which it will be a crime to approach for the purpose of securing information:

SEC. 6. The President of the United States shall have power to designate any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a) of section I hereof as a prohibited place for the purposes of this chapter.

That is the end of that grant of power, and it puts in the hands of the President the power and the authority to include the entire territory of the United States. There is no limit whatsoever to his authority in that respect.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator ought to have read the other

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I consciously did not, because I am about coming to the other line and will point out why it does not limit that authority.

The President of the United States shall have power to designate any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a)—

He can include any scene of activity in the whole country as a place which no citizen must approach for the purpose of ob-taining information in any way related to the national or public defense. Now I proceed-on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudi-cial to the national defense.

That is to say, if the President believes that information that could be secured in any of these places anywhere in the United States would be prejudicial to the national defense, he may include all such places within the prohibited category.

Now, I am not asserting, as I have repeatedly said, that any President would be guilty of so monstrous an act, but I am not willing to give him any power to be guilty of an act of that sort.

I know that he could exercise it to the very great disadvantage of the country, and he could in that way limit and restrict the liberties of our people far within the measure which they ought to enjoy. But that is not so bad after all as the thing which follows in section 6 is the climax, and I wish the Senator from Michigan would follow me there:

He shall further have the power, on the aforesaid ground-

That is, on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudicial to the national defense.

Any words of mine characterizing the paragraph I have just read would but weaken the impression which I am sure must be left upon the mind of any Senator as he hears the clause read. The marvel is that such a thing could ever be proposed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator construe that language to mean, we will say, that a committee of Congress would not have the power to investigate the condition of the Navy Department or the War Department in the event the President had withdrawn those two departments from all inquiry?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know how I ought to answer the Senator from New York. Plainly the words give him, or attempt to give him, that authority, but the proposal is so shocking that I could hardly believe any court would ever give it that interpretation.

Mr. BORAH. If they did, the act would be unconstitutional. Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. But the collusions between this chapter and the Constitution are very numerous, and I hope to reduce them somewhat.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator going to move to strike out section 6?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to move to strike out this part of it, and I am going to move to amend another part of it.

One more word and I shall have said all I care to say upon

The Senator from North Carolina suggests that this bill has been very materially modified since it came from the hands of the Attorney General. I will not gainsay that although I doubt the extent of the modification; but it is sufficient to say, so far as we are at this moment concerned that paragraph (a) to which I am directing myself is in the exact terms in which it came from the office of the Attorney General. It has not been changed or amended in any respect whatsoever. I sincerely hope, Mr. President, that my amendment will be adopted, and upon which I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

I am not doing that, of course, to cut off Mr. CUMMINS. debate, but when the vote is taken I want to have it taken in that way.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins], and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HUSTING. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I inadvertently voted. I have a pair with that Senator, and in his absence I will transfer the pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and let my vote stand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As already stated, I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. Harding]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Gore] and vote "nay."

So the amendment of Mr. Cummins was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on Saturday last I said to the Senate, toward the close of the discussion on that day, that I would offer an amendment to the feature of the bill then pending. I ask that my amendment be now presented to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The Secretary. On page 1 of the proposed amendment, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled," and insert in lieu thereof "without the permission, expressed or implied, of one lawfully entitled to give the same."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I merely desire to say in support of this amendment that the act denounced by the bill is not the securing of information concerning the national defense, as might be gathered from much of the discussion which has taken place. The act denounced by the bill is the going upon certain places, entering certain places, and so forth, and so forth, for the purpose of obtaining the information. It occurs to me that what we want to do is to punish the man who goes upon those places or who enters those places without permission to do so from some one who has lawful authority to grant such permission. Of course, if one were going there to get information to which he was lawfully entitled, he would undoubtedly secure or have permission to go there. I believe the bill would be improved, would be more definite in its character, and would more clearly define the crime to be punished by the adoption of the language which I have proposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be again stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment proposed by Mr.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is en agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LEE of Maryland obtained the floor.
Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina has indicated a willingness to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I mentioned in the debate on Saturday an instance of our lack of preparedness in connection with the construction of large movable guns. becoming accidentally acquainted some years ago with the conditions of our national defense in that respect I have made a point to try to keep in touch with the progress along that line, and to discover what, if any, progress in making these guns was being made. I went to the War Department a year ago and found out that nothing had been done. I visited the department this winter and ascertained that the six movable cannon, large movable guns of position, heretofore authorized have not yet been manufactured.

am heartily in favor of this amendment, because in going to the War Department and taking the matter up with military men or others having knowledge of the subject for the purpose of agitating this question or mentioning it here on the short, under this bill as originally drawn, I would be subject to indictment, I take it; but under the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] there would be an implied permission to make this inquiry about our preparedness until that permission were definitely withdrawn. I am inclined to think that the implied permission would save the citizen or the Member of Congress making apparently legitimate inquiry into the subject. So this amendment, Mr. President, is a very desirable one, in my humble judgment, in the interest of a proper public knowledge of the national defense, and should be adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. Since examining more carefully the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana, I hope it will not be adopted. I do not like the expression "without the permission, expressed or implied."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not all of the amendment.
Mr. OVERMAN. It reads "without the permission, expressed or implied, of one lawfully entitled to give the same." I hope the Senate will let the provision remain as it now stands. It is the same language as that contained in the act passed on March 3, 1911, from which I quoted when the Senator was not I repeat, that we have employed in this proposed statute the exact language used in that statute, no trouble has arisen because of that law, and no innocent man has been indicted or prosecuted. The law has worked well, but it is now out of date. This provision in the pending bill simply seeks to enlarge that statute, but the language proposed is copied directly verbatim et literatim from the old statute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator advise us what the act of March 3, 1911, is?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is very much like the provision of the pending bill now under discussion. Our attention was called to the fact that that statute needed to be amended and enlarged, and this provision simply seeks to do that. I will read the provision in the act of March 3, 1911, to the Senator, and will ask him to note the words:

That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled, goes upon any vessel or enters any navy yard, naval station, fort, battery, toppedo station, arsenal, camp, factory, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense owned or constructed or in process of construction by the United States, or in the possession or under the control of the United States, or any of its authorities or agents, and whether situated within the United States or in any place not contiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof—

And so forth. The Senator will see that the language employed in the provision now under consideration is exactly the same as that employed in that statute passed six years ago. I do not think it is necessary to modify it, and I hope the Senator will withdraw the amendment,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that that would operate very unjustly in some case

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the illustration the Senator gave the other day of an old lady going to the War Department and seeking information about her son and the whereabouts of the army in which he was serving. The Senator said that she might be guilty under this proposed statute of a violation of its terms. As I said at the time, however, and, as I now repeat, in a case of that kind nobody is going to file a complaint and no prosecuting officer would ever prosecute a case like that; no indictment would ever be presented and no jury would ever convict. So in the illustrations which have been given by the Senator from Iowa I can not imagine that anybody would ever present an indictment against a person in a case of that kind. We must, however, make the statute general.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with the Senator that no prosecution would be carried on in the case I have instanced; but, notwithstanding that fact, such an act falls under the condemnation of the proposed law. I should like to direct the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the objection I find in the language he has suggested, quoted from the act of 1911. One goes to the commander of a fort or any other structure in connection with the national defense and asks permission to go inside to gather some information. That permission is granted to him. Now, he is not lawfully entitled to it, and yet he very courteously went to the commandant of the fort or the navy yard, or went aboard a man-of-war, or something of that kind, with the entire consent and approval of the commander; he obtained some information that he wanted to get and which he told the commander he wanted to get, but to which he was not lawfully entitled; and he would be amenable to presecution.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. President, I think if a man gets the permission of the commander, or if some one who is authorized allows him to obtain the information, and the commander then lets him have it, he would not be amenable to prosecution under the words "lawfully entitled."

Mr. WALSH. But suppose there is an order out that that permission should not be granted?

Then he would not be entitled to have it. Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. WALSH. Exactly so, but he has permission to go there from the commander of the boat.

Mr. OVERMAN. But he goes there for the purpose of getting certain information, and he wants to use it for unlawful purposes. Mr. WALSH. That is where we differ. I assume that the man wants to use it for a perfectly lawful purpose; that he wants to publish, for instance, for the information of the world something about a contrivance on board of an American battleship. Now, we will assume that there is an order out to all commanders not to allow anybody to get any information about that matter, but he does not know anything about that; he has never heard of such an order; it has not been published; it is a secret instruction that has been given to the commander. He goes to the commander, and the commander forgets about the order, or for some reason or other-it does not make any difference what it is-he allows the man to go and make the inspection, and he writes about it. He is amenable to prosecution under this proposed act. It occurs to me, Mr. President—

Mr. OVERMAN. He might be amenable to the statute. So persons are amenable to all criminal statutes that have been passed, and yet men are not prosecuted when they are innocent. Mr. WALSH. I have submitted all I care to say, Mr.

Mr. President, if it is made unlawful for any person to do this thing under this bill, of course he is not excused on the ground of ignorance; if it is not made unlawful, then he can go, under the amendment of the Senator, if he can secure permission, and obtain exactly the information which it is the purpose of the law to prevent his obtaining. No one has any lawful right to do these things. The question is as to whether Congress will provide a penalty to prevent its being

The second objection that I find to the wording of the amendment is that the words "without the permission, expressed or implied," would simply give every spy in time of war or in time of peace a defense to work out technically in his trial before a jury. Everyone, if he surreptitiously, or by any method, obtains entrance to any of our works or our vesselsit makes no difference how he does it-if arrested, and if he did not have the express permission of the officer in charge to enter and obtain the information, would undoubtedly immediately set up the fact that his going there was in itself not unlawful, because the Senate of the United States had stricken out the words "to which he is not lawfully entitled," and that he had implied permission because he got there in some way. The very fact that sufficient guard was not kept to prevent his entrance would of itself enable him to make a defense before a jury upon his trial for violation of this act. I think that the intention of this provision is simply to broaden the act of

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the argument along this line. We have had for a great many years, for a hundred years or more, laws along this general line. Circumstances have developed, and it has become necessary from time to time to broaden these laws. The Senator in charge of the bill has called attention to the law of 1911, the language of which has been incorporated in this proposed law, and the object of the present section which we are now discussing is simply to enlarge the provisions of the act of March 3, 1911, to meet cases which have actually arisen, and for no other pur-

We are prohibiting here, for instance, the obtaining of information by flying over a ship of war in an aeroplane; we are preventing the obtaining of that information by approaching a ship for that purpose without entering upon it: we are broadening the law as it stands now, and not making anything unlawful which was not unlawful before, except as new circumstances have arisen, just as I have suggested in the matter of the development of aero flight, the possibility of which was never dreamed of a few years ago, even as late as 1911. That is all that this bill, which has been so vigorously condemned, is designed to accomplish. It simply broadens the law as it stands, taking in other cases. Heretofore it was made unlawful to enter a ship or to enter a military post for the purpose of to enter a ship or to enter a military post for the purpose of obtaining information, and now the language is simply broadened to prohibit the doing of other acts for the same purpose or to the same effect.

As I have said, to excuse a person for going upon a ship for this purpose by allowing him to offer in his defense that he had the implied permission of some subordinate in command of the ship or of the fort or of the work of harbor defense or munition factory, or whatever it might be, would simply be to offer a premium to spies irstead of prohibiting their methods.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I want to come back to the concrete case of those six guns and to draw the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to that case. I should like to have him consider that particular instance. If the Senator will listen to me, I will remind him of the instance. I just mentioned it here a little while ago.

We are absolutely defenseless so far as these large movable pieces are necessary to defense in modern war. We have not made, so far as I can ascertain, any of them. I did not imagine it possible that so important a matter had been vegetating for years—several years from the time I put a letter here in the records of the Senate stating that it was just being taken up and started with the War Department. I happened to mention the matter to a young officer of the Regular Army in the War Department this winter and learned from him that we were just as defenseless now with respect to those great guns as we ever have been. Now, Mr. President, was that inquiry a crime? I had no express right to be in the War Department to ask that question. There was an implied right in any citizen of the United States, there was an implied right in any Senator of the United States, to enter that department and get proper information as to the conduct of the public affairs, either from a legislative standpoint or as a voter in this country.

I do not understand the extraordinary nervousness and excitability shown in this bill. We can not discuss our unpreparedness under this bill. The Senator knows that these great guns can be made only in a few places in the United States. There are only a half dozen factories or arsenals, or perhaps not that many, where they can be made. Does any informed man suppose for a moment that the great Governments of Europe have not already placed their enlisted, paid informers in those gun shops? Why, they have them plentifully there; and yet, while these foreign Government know all about our defenselessness, under the terms of this statute we, or the people of this country, can not inquire and agitate to expedite making these guns for the defense of our coasts.

I want to call attention to the language of the President of the United States in his message to Congress on December 8, 1914. Speaking of this very question of preparedness, he says:

We shall not alter our attitude toward it because some amongst us are nervous and excited.

Mr. President, because we are nearer a possible climax likely to show the need of preparedness and apparently, taking this great gun incident, no nearer preparedness than we ever were years ago, shall we shut down upon all sources of information or possibility of publicly discussing this question so that we can meet it effectually and in manner appropriate in a free country? Is not the phraseology of this act, its actual scope, whether so intended or not, a protection to inefficiency in the War Department?

I know the Senator is not looking at it from that standpoint; but we have got to take the meaning of these words as written and we must consider the natural effect of these words. Supposing that some one in authority in the War Department, being somewhat galled under the criticisms of his own conduct, of his own lack of action for proper preparation, of the absence of these movable great guns that we need so much along our coast lines, should undertake to prosecute and imprison a citizen who ascertains that we are defenseless and proclaims the fact to the people of the country for the purpose of creating some kind of defense, when we all know, and everyone of us knows, that there is not one of these great gun shops of the country that is not sprinkled with the spies of foreign nations, who can tell their Governments just what we have and what we have not made! Such a silencing prosecution would seem to lie under the wording of this act.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland has directed his remarks to me, I shall in a very few words undertake to answer them, if an answer is necessary.

The Senator from Maryland apparently bases his objections to this section upon the use of the word "building" or "office," and illustrates by recounting an incident where he had the temerity to enter the War Department Building, and there to ask information from some clerk or some one engaged in the War Department.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator for a moment?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The information I referred to was given me by a Regular Army officer.

Mr. FALL. The Senator, then, as I understand, to be perand I want to be correct—had the temerity to fectly correctenter the War Department and there to obtain some information from some officer in the military service of the United States. He concludes that he would be guilty of an offense under this act if he repeated that proceeding; and therefore, as he might possibly be prosecuted in the event he entered the War Department, he objects to the entire act as being such a highhanded procedure as he has never heard of in the history of any nation, I presume.

So far as the Senator's criticism upon the War Department is concerned, or the Navy Department, or any other department of this Government for dilatoriness in preparedness, or his implied criticism of the President for saying that it was not necessary for us to become prepared, he can wrestle with his own conscience and his own party. I have nothing to say upon that subject. I have this, however, to say as to this particular bill, and as to the instance which the Section 1.

and as to the instance which the Senator cites:

The Senator knows perfectly well that the Congress of the United States has the right, not prohibited by this bill, and that he, as one of its Members, has an absolute constitutional right to invoke that right of Congress in time of war or otherwise, to ask, demand, or secure information with reference to the national defense from the proper authorities. He knows perfectly well, of course, that it was within his power to offer a Senate resolution or a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution demanding information upon the subject which he was at that time investigating, and that with the official information in hand, obtained, not simply from some one officer, but from the proper legal authorities capable of getting it, he could have formulated and advanced a criticism which the whole country would have heard.

We have all, possibly, seen matters in the conduct of the affairs of our Government which were subject to criticism. That is one of the defects of our form of Government. It is one of the defects which we are now seeking to cure by vesting in some one authority the power to protect the interests of the people of the United States, where such authority is not vested at the present time.

The Senator has said that we are in a crisis. We are; but to my mind the crisis now confronting the people of the United States is much more serious as it affects them nationally, as it affects their own form of Government and the perpetuity of their institutions, than is such crisis as dependent upon the re-sult of present negotiations or failure to negotiate with certain countries of the world, no matter what the immediate result of such negotiations or failure to negotiate may be. In other words, I think the people of the United States are now on trial; that it is a question now as to whether this democracy is capable of continuing and perpetuating itself. The other democracies of the world—more pure democracies in many respects, more democratic in their form of government in many respects than this-have found that they were inefficient, that they were not prepared even to preserve their national lives or existence. The Socialist Briand, in France, has been vested with more authority than Napoleon Bonaparte ever had when he was the conquerer of the world-vested with that absolute dictatorship and authority by a democracy purer than ours, more nearly a democratic government than ours, because they found that the democracy itself could not compete with the autocracy headed by the Kaiser and the national efficiency worked out by the most autocratic Government in the world.

The same thing has been discovered with relation to another democracy, which is even more democratic in many respects than ours—that of Great Britain. They have found that it was absolutely inefficient, that it was incompetent, when it was confronted with the efficiency and competency of the autocracy of the Kaiser; and it has been necessary for that great democracy of Great Britain to confer the most absolute autocratic power upon Lloyd George, the most radical statesman whom Great Britain has ever known, the man who has gone further toward State socialism in Great Britain than any other prominent statesman has ever been able to go, and who has carried the people of Great Britain with him.

I say to you now that you yourselves, this legislative body, are incompetent and inefficient. You are proving to the people of the United States every day your inefficiency and your incompetency to take care of the affairs of this Government. You are doing it either by acts of omission or by acts of commission every day of the world. It is a question as to whether we can preserve our form of government and protect ourselves in a crisis—an international crisis and a national crisis.

I say that while I have no reason personally to entertain any feeling of friendship of any kind or character for the present occupant of the White House, while I have been as severe in my criticisms of him, of his acts, or rather of his failure to act, as any Senator or any man in the United States, I believe that it is absolutely essential to the salvation of this Government now that some man who will act shall have the power to act in times I believe that it is necessary that we should have laws which will enable us to control the spies of foreign countries, who, as the Senator says, now have access to the intimate secrets of this Government for its national defense. I believe that the Congress of the United States should vest in the Executive Department at this time absolute, arbitrary powers; and I believe that without that this Government itself and the perpetuity of our democratic institutions are at stake. For that reason I am willing to yield something of my previous convictions with reference to one-man power. I am willing to support the man whom I have criticized as strongly as any man in the United States has criticized him, just as far as he will allow me to support him—not, I may say, as the leader of a party who comes to the Capitol and seeks advice only from the members of his own party; not that form of support, but I am willing to support him as the President of the United States, in whom is vested the executive authority, and who stands before the people of the world as the representative of this great Govern-To him I am willing to yield authority, and I am ment of ours. willing to vest him with the power necessary to carry it out. I am willing to trust to the courts to see that justice is done to the Senator in the event that he, as a Senator, seeks to set the War Department right upon some matter concerning which they have been negligent, or which they have overlooked.

The Senator knows that under this law, making it unlawful, he would neither be prosecuted nor would he be convicted by any court or by any tribunal before which he was tried, if he repeated exactly the experiment which he undertook to carry out and to which he has referred. The Senator is a lawyer, and he knows it. The Senator knows that there must be criminal statutes, general rules, prohibiting all manner of offenses. There is a general law, and it must be a general law, prohibiting the taking of human life by another; and yet there are exceptions, there are defenses to every law, and the courts are the place to make them, under a proper defense of justification, for instance.

The Senator knows that no matter what indictment or information might be laid upon such an offense as he is reciting, in any court the indictment would go down upon a statement of the case; and he, a Senator, interested in the welfare of his country, calling the attention of any official of this Government to a matter of the kind to which he has referred, seeking information with respect to it in behalf of his country, walking into the War Department, knows that he would go with impunity. He knows that he would never be indicted, and he knows that no jury of his peers would ever convict him for such a supposed offense, any more than a man justifiable under the laws of a State would be precluded from pleading self-defense, although there is a general statute prohibiting homicide.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not take it that this paragraph is attempting to prevent a person from going into a navy yard or on a vessel, or to make it a crime to go into a navy yard or a crime to go on a vessel. If that were the declaration of the paragraph, I would understand the amendment of the Senator from Montana, because then it would be a crime to go on a vessel or into a navy yard without the permission of those in charge.

That, however, is not the object of the paragraph. It is not the stated purpose of it. It states very plainly that it applies to whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense to which he is not lawfully entitled, shall do certain things. The crime does not consist in going into a navy yard or going on a vessel, but the crime consists in going there with a criminal intent, for a criminal purpose. The Senator from Montana, under his amendment, permits a man to go there for a criminal purpose, for the purpose of criminally obtaining information, against the law, simply by the implied consent of some one in charge of the work or the vessel. I do not believe that Congress desires to allow anyone to unlawfully obtain the information with regard to our vessels or our navy yards simply upon the implied consent of anyone; and yet that is what his amendment means.

If the Senator wants to place a different section in this bill, or a different paragraph, stating that no one shall go into a navy yard or on a vessel without the permission of the officer in charge, I would vote for it; but I can not vote to allow anyone to unlawfully obtain information with regard to our Navy or its works upon the implied consent of anyone. I think that to adopt this amendment is going to destroy the effectiveness of this paragraph as a criminal statute, because a man can obtain the implied consent to go in a navy yard, and no matter on what pretext he obtains that implied consent he is not guilty, if his real purpose be to unlawfully obtain information to which he is not entitled. I certainly insist that this amendment would destroy the very purpose of the act.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I think there is a misconception here of the ordinary methods of spies, and a mixing up of spy methods with the free habits of the American citizen. Now, a spy who wants to find out about a navy yard of the United States or a ship of the United States, or where and how great guns and their mounts are being manufactured by a private party under contract with the United States, enlists; he becomes a workman in that yard; he becomes a sailor in our Navy; he becomes a person authorized to go there and observe those details.

Why, Mr. President, do you suppose that signal book which was stolen off a United States naval ship was stolen by an American citizen who was wrongfully there? Quite the contrary. That signal book was stolen by an emissary of some foreign Government enlisted in the Navy of the United States and watching for every possible opportunity to steal any signal book or acquire any other information that would be to the good of his Government and bad for ours.

This law as framed strikes me as showing every sign of somebody being nervous and excited. It goes out and embraces a lot of innocent things that the American has been in the habit of doing and ought to do as a self-governing man, and makes those innocent things crimes. It does not get by that any closer to the spy that stole the signal book off that ship. It does not get at the spy who will report to every Government in the world that we have not yet designed, completed, or manufactured the mounts for those six movable guns.

Mr. President, we should draw a great line in this proposition. There is one great line to be drawn between peace and war. That is one great line that this act does not apparently draw. Then there has got to be another line drawn, and that is between the normal, innocent habits of our people and the designing conduct of the spy. It is a very reprehensible thing to draw a statute in such wise that it can be used to prevent publicity in a republican form of government, that it can be used in such ways as to punish a citizen who is doing a patriotic thing in proclaiming that his country is undefended, and pointing out where her defenses should be strengthened.

Mr. President, there was nothing excited about the President of the United States when he gave that message on December 8, 1914. and I do not believe that the President is excited now, although it might be inferred from what has been said here in this Chamber that he has become so.

On December 8, 1914, the President said, in this same message:

It is right, too, that the National Guard of the States should be developed and strengthened by every means which is not inconsistent with our obligations to our own people or with the established policy of our Government. And this, also, not because the time or occasion specially calls for such measures but because it should be our constant policy to make these provisions for our national peace and safety.

More than this carries with it a reversal of the whole history and character of our polity.

character of our polity.

Mr. President, there is a great newspaper combination in this country, there is a combination of men, who perhaps are acting within the limits of their convictions, in the Regular Army of the United States, to break down the larger part of the military efficiency of this country on land, as represented by the National Guard system of this country. The President of the United States has expressed himself in favor of the National Guard system of this country. Mr. President, I propose at an early date to show on this floor how for year after year, and especially during this great mobilization, there has been a series of things taking place that show that there has long been a combination in high official circles and the press against the National Guard, the most numerous portion of the land defense of the country. I deem it my duty to acquire all the informa-tion I can on that subject, and I do not propose to sit here quietly and help pass a law under which anyone of these emissaries of centralized power, anyone of these people that want to Prussianize the Government of the United States, can send me or any other citizen, inside or outside of the Senate, to jail because we inquire into and expose these attacks upon the National Guard system, or because we inquire into and expose the lack of preparation in the Regular Army.

Mr. President, this law goes too far. It is nervous and excited to a high degree. We have created in this country a free Constitution. Armies have been created before. Great battless have been fought throughout the ages. Armies and battles are but the common incident of the history of mankind, but the but the common incident of the history of mankind, but the creation of a free Constitution and the maintenance of free institutions are something new, relatively speaking, in the history of the world. This great country represents that great idea, and will represent it, I hope, through all time to come; and for us, the chosen representatives of the people here, for the Democratic Party of all parties, the party that believes in the rights of the people and the rights of local self-government, for my party, the Democratic Party, to be guilty of such extraordinary, sweeping, statutory limitations of public rights as this law contains, Mr. President, is a shock to my party principles as well as a surprise.

ciples as well as a surprise.

I do not believe that the President of the United States is a party to this radical statute-certainly not to the extent that has been intimated. It is inconsistent with the calm dignity of his message, from which I have just quoted. It is inconsistent with the principles upon which he was reared and for which he stands in this country. It is inconsistent with the reasons for which he was put first in the White House, and then put back in the White House. I believe, Mr. President, that the public safety can be protected by a democratic and sane form of lawmaking, entirely free from the color of military dictation which this bill shows. I do not believe that the public safety renders it necessary for us to grant a power that might at some time be used to beat down the ordinary rights of the American citizen in the way that this statute makes it possible to beat them down.

There have been a great many occasions in the Senate when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] and the Senator from California [Mr. Works] were inveighing against the alleged encroachments upon the rights of Congress by the present administration with which I had no sympathy. I think when I first came into this body the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cum-MINS] was intimating that increasing the parcel-post package from sundry pounds to sundry other pounds was an encroachment by the administration on the rights of Congress in some way. I may not have accurately described the occasion, but I remember taking issue with him on that question at that time. Mr. President, on this occasion these critics, if they are criticizing the administration-and I very much doubt whether the administration is responsible—on this occasion these critics, as watchdogs of American liberty, let us say, are not upon a false trail. This is a serious proposition, and I am inclined to think that it has been most hastily presented and misrepresenfed in chapter first of this bill, the part of the measure to which I object. These objects could be attained by other language and other protection thrown around our land defenses, such little defenses as we have. God knows they are small; but I believe the proper protection could be thrown around them without this dangerous provision as against individual freedom to run on and on in times of peace.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on February 17, 1917, approved and signed the following

S. 5082. An act adding certain lands to the Missoula National Forest, Mont.;

S. 5632. An act for the relief of Aquilla Nebeker; and

S. 6595. An act to reimburse William Blair for losses and damages sustained by him by the negligent dipping of his cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 7796. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the Great Northern Railway Co. certain lands in the State of Montana for division terminal yards and other railway purposes, and for other purposes; and S. 8079. An act to amend the first and seventh paragraphs of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of April 9, 1906.

The message also announced that the House had passed resolutions relative to the life and public services of Hon. BENJA-MIN F. SHIVELY, late a Senator from the State of Indiana.

The message further announced that the House had passed resolutions relative to the life and public services of Hon. James P. Clarke, late a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion to advert for a moment to another matter. The price of those things which enter into daily living, of everything which we wear and which we eat, has reached a point where it presents a national crisis. It has brought about a situation which it seems to me we can not longer afford to ignore, if there is any possible way by which we can intelligently and effectively deal with it. I read from an article in the New York Sun of yesterday:

Prices of common staple vegetables—potatoes, cabbages, and onions—have soared to such heights in the past two months that the average housewife is now compelled to consider them in the light of luxuries. They have reached a point where they are twice as expensive as in Civil War times. Apparently there are no substitutes for these very necessary items of food—all foodstuffs have been caught in the market swirl of high price—and the woman who buys for her family has to be ingenious indeed to figure out how to make a dollar go where a quarter or a half went before.

The other afternoon, on my way home, I dropped into a market and while there a woman came into the market, apparently the wife of a workingman, or a man of limited means at any rate, and began to price the articles in the market; and pricing them one after another seemed to be utterly astounded at the prices. Finally she turned and went from the market without making any purchases, with this ejaculation to herself: "I do not know what we are to do."

It was simply tragic, as I witnessed it there.

I have no doubt that even in these times of certain kinds of prosperity that is the situation which confronts the wife of practically every workingman in the United States and the wife of every man who is drawing a limited salary. At a time when we are enjoying a period of prosperity, by reason of conditions particularly superinduced by the war, such as we have never before known in the history of this country, particularly along certain lines, there are literally hundreds of thousands of people who are living on the ragged edge of hunger, who are worried from day to day and from month to month as to how they shall meet the situation which confronts them. I do not see how they clothe and feed their families. It is, to say the least, a harrowing situation,

I am aware, of course, as everyone is, that the war brought on a condition of affairs which had its effect upon prices. I presume that a certain per cent of the increase of prices of all articles, both clothing and food articles, has been brought on by reason of war conditions.

But, Mr. President, I am clear in my own mind that there are those operating in these products and articles who have taken advantage of the conditions presented by the war, and under cover of the fact that the war is supposed to have induced a rise of prices, have increased them through monopolistic combines and other combinations practically 50 per cent higher than otherwise they need to be by reason of any real conditions brought on by the war. Assuming that raises would be laid to the war, they have wrought their schemes of speculation and are making millions through combines and by speculation out of those things which constitute the necessaries of life

I do not know, and that is the reason why I rose, and the only reason, whether our laws, in the minds of those who must execute them, at present are sufficient and efficient to deal with this situation or not. I believe that they are if they were enforced. In that I may be in error. If they are not sufficient, they should be made so at once.

It was my purpose this morning to introduce a resolution addressed to the Attorney General, whose department I am advised has had to do with the investigation of some of these matters, and who, I presume, is in touch with the other departments of the Government, The Trade Commission, and so forth, to make inquiry as to whether or not, in the judgment of the Department of Justice, the laws at the present time are sufficient and efficient to deal with this situation. If they are not before this Congress adjourns we ought to hear from that department and perfect these laws. I do not want Congress to adjourn and leave the officers whose duty it is to execute the laws without ample means to deal with the matter effectively. I do not want to see merely investigation; I want to see action, speedy and condign.

I am perfectly satisfied from investigations which I have made, both as to the facts and as to the laws, that this condition could be relieved and the high prices of products very materially changed by a proper enforcement of law. It may be that in some details they are not sufficient and efficient for the purpose, but generally speaking I believe that they are.

But I did not introduce the resolution because I thought I could express the purpose of the resolution here, and I sincerely hope that before this Congress closes, if the Attorney General and those who are in charge of these situations are not satisfied with the laws which are now upon the statute books and believe that they are inefficient for the purpose of protecting this situation, that that should be made known to Congress and that Congress may deal with it. If there is anything outside of actual war for which we could afford above all other things to remain in extraordinary session it is this.

I should like to see a specific statement from the department as to what is necessary, just such as it made here as to the neutrality laws in national defense. They have been dealing with the situation, attempting, I assume, to enforce the law, and are satisfied by this time as to whether or not the law is sufficient for their purposes.

A few days ago we were advised that by reason of an investigation which had been started and had partially proceeded the manufacturers of print paper had been brought to a position where they were willing to arbitrate and willing to have the prices of their product fixed by some arbitral tribunal, selecting, as I am informed, the Federal Trade Commission.

Of course, if they selected the Federal Trade Commission, they selected it as they would any other arbitrator, because the Trade Commission in and of itself has no power to fix prices. But, Mr. President, if a proper investigation conducted in an efficient manner has brought one class of people to a point where they are willing to have prices fixed, a sufficient investigation under proper laws would bring about a condition where others would be willing to answer as to why the prices which they are charging are made at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

In this connection, if the Senator will per-Mr. FLETCHER. mit me, I will say the experience of the Joint Committee on I that that occurs pretty generally in the market where the man

Printing with reference to paper and the information which that committee has obtained leads quite to the conclusion—perhaps I will not be justified in stating it as an absolute fact, but the evidence is quite convincing—that the increased cost of machine-finished paper has been about six-tenths of 1 cent a pound for the last year, and the bills offered to the Joint Committee on Printing ranged all the way from 3 to 8 cents a pound over that figure. So whereas the increased cost on paper, and that refers to machine-finished paper, has been less than 1 cent a pound you can not get any of that kind of paper to-day for less than from 3 to 8 cents a pound more than was charged a year ago. There is something wrong somewhere. I can imagine that the condition with reference to machine-finished paper is quite as acute and needs remedying quite as much as print paper.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, according to statistics the prices of those things upon which the American people must live, if they live at all, have increased about 366 per cent in the last few months. There is no one who thinks for a moment that that is all due to natural causes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

I simply wish to ask the Senator for his view with reference to the situation in regard to some farm products. Potatoes in my section are selling for from $50 to $75 a ton: that is, the farmer, the man who produces them, is getting that Does the Senator think that that is the result of a combination or that we could reduce that price to the farmers by legislative act?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether that is true or not. But if there is not a combination in one State that is no proof that there may not be elsewhere.

I understand that those who produce onions are getting $100 a ton for them. It seems to me there must be some very material cause for those very high prices. Of course if it is done under a combination, we ought to punish that under the law; but if it is the result of conditions that actually exist in this country, whether of the war or lack of production or something of that sort, I do not see how we are in a position to reach those high prices.

Mr. BORAH. It is altogether probable there are some products which, by reason of loss of crops or small crops, have been affected in that way; but take the entire range of products upon which the American people live and there is scarcely an exception. The price upon practically all has gone up from 300 to 350 per cent. There have not been any such losses of crops in this country as that.

Mr. JONES. I have a letter here that I received this morning from a farmer of Walla Walla, Wash. He refers to this matter in a general way as a farmer, and he suggests a remedy in his letter. He says he is willing to have an embargo placed upon food products. He seems to think that is the reason why the prices are going so high, and while he is engaged in the production of those things he takes into account other people who do not see hardly how they can live if the prices continue to go up. He says here:

I was told to-day by a butcher that hogs would go to 15 cents a pound, live weight.

That would mean 15 cents a pound to the raiser of the hogs, not in the markets of the country for the packers, and so forth, but it would go to the man who raises the hogs.

Mr. BORAH. If it must go to somebody, I am glad it goes to him.

Mr. JONES. I am glad, too. It occurred to me that by legislation we would not be able to reduce those prices, at any rate to a man who produced these things, even if we wanted to do it. I sympathize with the suggestion of this man here, and I hardly see how the people who purchase these things are going to live if the prices go very much higher. It would be very hard for us to consider legislation looking to fixing prices to the men who produce these natural products.

Mr. BORAH. Of course it is not a noncomplex question; it is not a wholly simple proposition. I realize, in the first place, as I said in the beginning, the war has brought on high prices; undoubtedly it had its effect upon prices; that we all concede, and we must submit to it; but I have no doubt, either, it is somewhat like when we change the tariff laws, some merchant marks up goods, and when you come in and ask why he will tell you because the change of the tariff, when perhaps that particular article has not had any change in the tariff or it may have been reduced.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will permit me, I am satisfied who does not produce the natural product has the disposal of it. I think that is done pretty generally; but, nevertheless, we can not get around the fact that the prices of these natural in the hands of those who produce them are very much higher than they were a few years ago. That seems to be pretty general; and in reference to the articles that the laboring man, for instance, must buy and consume I have not any doubt that the party from whom he directly buys in town does take advantage of the very situation the Senator suggests and adds on an unconscionable amount.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator, does the Senator know how much that particular hog which the farmer sells at 15 cents represents in price when it gets to the consumer? It has gone up between the time it left the farmer and the time it reaches the table about 500 per cent.

Mr. JONES. I know it is pretty high in cases where they put on prices based on a fictitious proposition.

Mr. BORAH. It is only the fictitious price that I am addressing myself to. If it should be discovered and demonstrated that there are no fictitious prices, that this is a situation superinduced by natural causes—by the war and other conditions which have followed it—it would be a situation to which we must submit. I have not a particle of doubt-and I have been giving some attention to these matters in the last six months—but the larger portion of these prices is fictitious and that if the fictitious part were taken out the American people would have very little reason to complain about the situation. If the laws of our country are not sufficient to deal with it, they ought to be made so. If they are, they ought to be enforced to determine whether or not there are fictitious prices. If they are, whoever is responsible for them should be accordingly dealt with under

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there is an appropriation, is there not, made by Congress at the disposal of the Department of Justice for making inquiry into such questions as the Senator has raised?

Mr. BORAH. I understand so. Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if the department has reason to think there is any violation of the Sherman antitrust law it has a special appropriation for that purpose. Does the Senator know whether there is any shortage in that appropriation or not?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not. Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether the Department of Justice has some funds to carry on this inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not informed as to that; I do not know. But I do not desire, Mr. President, to charge that the Department of Justice has not been doing its duty. I think this, however: The nonenforcement of the law has been slack for a good while. I do not know whether it is by reason of the in-applicability of the law to the situation or the ineffectiveness of the law, or whether the fault rests elsewhere. To my mind the best thing that we could possibly do under this situation is to have some grand juries called near certain stock-produce exchanges and certain boards which are in fact boards of speculation. I believe that that would bring about some facts which would enable us to know more about the real situation as to these fictitious prices.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator mean stock exchanges or produce exchanges?

Mr. BORAH. Both.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not intend to cast any reflection on the Department of Justice.

Mr. BORAH. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply have felt this way about it; That, in my opinion, we had about all the law which it was possible for the mind of man to devise for prohibiting combinations in restraint of trade. It seemed to me that if this tremendous rise of prices was fictitious, as the Senator said, the remedy was by inquiry to find who was in the combination to artificially and unlawfully raise the prices. I think it is of sufficient importance for the country and all of the people in it that if the department is short of funds to make this very necessary inquiry, or if it can do so on a scale that will make it efficient, then it is the duty of Congress to institute a nation-wide inquiry of its own through the proper instrumentalities and appropriate all the money necessary to carry it to a successful conclusion.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President—
Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I ask leave to insert in connection with my remarks the quotation of prices here from the New York Sun.

He insisted that food speculators are not responsible for conditions, but he did admit that there is one commission firm in Norfolk which has a corner on all potatoes grown in Virginia this year. This firm contracted for these potatoes at $1.50 to $3 per barrel, and they are now letting them go into the market at $9 to $9.50.

Just a year ago yesterday fresh gathered eggs, known as "extras," were sold at wholesale at 25 to 26 cents a dozen. Yesterday's price for the same grade was from 46 to 46½ cents. The best cold-storage eggs cost from 19 to 20½ cents a dozen on February 17, 1916. The same kind of refrigerator eggs brought yesterday in the wholesale market from 42 to 42½ cents a dozen, or 4 cents less than "fresh gathered extras."

Creamery butter "extras" cost 34½ cents a pound a year ago. The wholesale price for the same grade of butter yesterday was 46 to 46½ cents per pound.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, the problem as to the high cost of living is solved in at least one respect. We no longer hear, as was the case five years ago, that the high cost of living is entirely due to the former protective tariff. That was the doctrine enunciated by the successful candidate for the Presidency at that time and by the campaign orators who supported him. The truth is, in my opinion at least, that the high cost of living is largely due to a natural cause, that cause being the abundance Never before in the history of the world of gold in circulation. has there been so much gold in circulation per capita, and as gold is the yardstick by which all values are measured it is inevitable that when it is very abundant the prices of other commodities are enhanced, because gold by reason of its superabundance is gradually cheapened.

This is not a new experience in financial history. phenomenon occurred in Europe after the discovery of America. When, about 1520, the Spaniards conquered Mexico and Peru, they seized and sent back to Spain hitherto undreamed of stores of gold and silver, as the precious metals were very rare articles in the Old World during the Middle Ages. When these treasures arrived in Europe prices immediately began to rise, and in the year 1572 the price of everything, in France at least, had increased from five to six times. I have read a very interesting memorial on this subject, which was addressed to the French Government in those early days. The author described the enormous rise in prices and gave many reasons which hold good to-day, enlarging particularly upon what I hold was the true reason, which was the abundance of gold in circulation. He then proceeded to discuss other causes for the high cost of living, such as the increase in luxury, and finally wound up by insisting that a contributory cause was because the King of France had failed to put an embargo on breadstuffs leaving the

Mr. President, I shall not object to any inquiry as to the existence of any combination or other abuses connected with the high cost of living. On the contrary, I favor all such measures; but in my opinion all prices will be substantially higher than they have been for many years past so long as a superabundant gold supply is in circulation throughout the world.

Without the express permission of one lawfully entitled to give the same.

That strikes out the words "or implied." The reason I offer the amendment to the amendment is simply this: I fear that the circumstances from which consent might be implied in this case might be the subject of dispute, and that, too, in time of peril or in time of need of the utmost care and caution. I think express permission should be given by one lawfully entitled to give any permission at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] will accept that amendment to his amendment. It strikes me as being a very important change. It does seem to me that this permission ought to be expressed, and that there ought to be no question raised as to whether or not it is implied.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am sure we are all actuated by a single purpose—to expedite the passage of this legislation and to pass it in the best form. The objection which I have to the amendment suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Sterling], and which has been commended by the Senator from Florida [Mr. Fletcher], is that it seems to me entirely impracticable. Every employee in the navy yard here—and I understand there are some thousands of them—is daily getting information of the most important character concerning the national defense. Those employees are obliged to go about their work, and they are obliged to go to various places about the navy yard and elsewhere, for the purpose of getting information in relation to the national defense. You can not give an express written authority to every one of these employees under the Government every time he goes into those places.

Mr. PITTMAN. Are not the officers and agents to whom the Senator refers entitled to that information?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. But the plan is to strike out the language "to which he is lawfully entitled" and to substitute the language proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is what I meant. The language of the bill now is "not lawfully entitled." Consequently the language of the bill as it is now would exclude the agents and officers of the Government from its operation-

Mr. STERLING. I can not think, Mr. President-

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark, in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], that, in my estimation, it would not have the effect suggested by him, because when a man is employed in the navy yard he has implied authority to go in and to come out in accordance with the rules of the navy yard; he has implied authority to go wherever it is necessary for him to go in order to get the information necessary to do his work. So he has the implied authority to get whatever information is incident to the doing of that work.

I would not be averse to accepting the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota if it did not occur to me that it is simply impracticable to give express authority to every person who is required to go in or about such places.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, all I have to say, in answer to that suggestion, is to give my own view, which is that the act could not apply to and is not intended to apply to employees of a navy yard or those on board a vessel. course, get information in going about the performance of their everyday work and duties; but it is made to apply-and can hardly receive any other construction—to those who are outside of the service who may be seeking information in regard to the national defense and not to those who are in the service.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am a little uncertain whether the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] makes the case better or worse. In one respect it has a great advantage over the words now in the substitute; in another, I think it is more objectionable. The real spirit of the legislation is disclosed by the argument of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Fall], and is expressed in the "democracy efficient." It is the same spirit that moved Alexander in his mastery of the world, that led Cæsar to his victories, and that animated Napoleon in his wonderful triumphs. If that be the spirit of democracy, if that be efficient democracy, I have failed to apprehend its true form and purpose.

Mr. President, Great Britain is not a democracy at this time; France is not a democracy at this time; Germany never has been a democracy. Martial law controls Great Britain; martial law controls France; and martial law prevails in Germany. If we have reached a time when we desire to declare martial law throughout the United States, then we ought to adopt unmodified this legislation, for while it is not in form martial law, it is in effect miltary rule.

I said on Saturday last that if we ever reach a time when we must have martial law in all or in a part of the United States, I shall be the last man to question the supreme authority of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy; but this legislation is to control the people of this country in time of peace. not in time of war. It is not limited to the duration of any war; it is to continue indefinitely; and it is to establish the relations of our people to their Government for all time, so far as we are now able to say. In those circumstances I do not believe that we ought to treat all the people of this country as enemies of their country. I do not believe we ought to put them on the basis of the spy. That is what is being done. You are denying to the people of this country the information which is properly denied to a spy, and only properly denied

If there were apt words here confining the offense to those instances in which the information is sought for an improper purpose, I would have no objection to it at all. Shortly after I finished my remarks upon my own amendment I received a note from a very intelligent gentleman, who is in this Chamber, and whose name, of course, I shall not give-not a Member of the -but I intend to read it and to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] a question about it. The note says:

I desire to approach the Bureau of Navigation in the navy yard to recure some lantern slides of pictures of battleships appearing in the Washington Star of yesterday. Could I go there safely with this law in effect?

Mr. OVERMAN. He could get permission to go there.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, in all seriousness, whether or not that person could go there and ask for that information?

Mr. OVERMAN. He could, unless there were some law or regulation forbidding him to go there.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just the difference between the law as it now is and the law as it would be if amended as proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh]. Under the provision as it is now reported, it is made an offense to enter upon these places for the purpose of securing information to which the person is not lawfully entitled.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I say. This person is not lawfully entitled to the information.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is this person lawfully entitled to ask for lantern slides of battleships, the pictures of which appeared in yesterday morning's Star?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know anything about whether or not such things ought to be furnished, but if this person is lawfully entitled to them, he could get them; and if he is not, he could not get them. That is all there is about it. could not get them. That is all there is about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But he would be guilty of an offense when he asked for them.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he was not entitled to them, of course, he would be, if he went there for such a purpose

Mr. CUMMINS. But if he merely asked the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation for a lantern slide of a picture of a battleship, which had already been made public property-

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Then, unless the chief of the bureau could say to him, "You are lawfully entitled to this information," he would be guilty under the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. If such information has been made public property, he would not be guilty. Mr. CUMMINS. Why not?

Mr. OVERMAN. Because he would not then be guilty of a

Mr. CUMMINS. But because some newspaper gets the information to which it is not lawfully entitled-

Mr. OVERMAN. But the newspaper got it when there was o such law. That is what I say. We have now no such law no such law. That is what I say. We have now no such law in this country, but it is essential that we should have some law to protect ourselves against these offenses. I do not know whether or not from the publication of these pictures in the newspaper there is danger of giving improper information. I do not know how the newspaper got them. It may be that the information should not have been given out; it may have been a secret of the department, which ought not to have been given

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not talking about that. It seems to me that the Senator from North Carolina will not confine his mind to the point that it is proposed to make it a crime to ask for this information.

If the person is not entitled to it; yes. Mr. OVERMAN. But who is to determine whether or not he Mr. CUMMINS.

is entitled to it?

Mr. OVERMAN. If he goes there for the purpose of getting

Mr. CUMMINS. Who is to determine whether or not he is entitled to it?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made it very plain the other day. This language necessarily means in violation of some rule or some statute. It could not mean anything else. You can not go into every detail about everything in a statute; you have to make the law general; I thought the explanation of the Senator from Utah was very clear on that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. And yet, when I offered the amendment phrased in almost the identical language of the Senator from Utah, the Senator from North Carolina made a most earnest argument against it and succeeded in defeating it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President-

I yield to the Senator from Nevada. Mr. CUMMINS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I fail to find anything in the bill that either prohibits or attempts to prohibit the asking of any question to ascertain what information may be legally obtained. The letter which the gentleman wrote to the Senator shows that he is cautious, and there would be no harm in directing that very question contained in the letter to the captain of any battleship or to the superintendent of any navy yard. The language is this:

That whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense, * * * approaches, goes upon, or enters—

What? A navy yard or a vessel or a public work. There is no attempt in this bill to say that any individual shall not ask for information as to what the law is and what his rights are, and I do not think any committee would every try to place in the bill any such provision. If there is in the bill—and I fail to see it—any such paragraph, the Senator can move to strike it out, and that will simplify things. Certainly the gentleman who wrote to the Senator, it not being made a crime to ask permission, would not hesitate to ask for such permission from the proper officers. Instead of asking the Senator on the floor, why does the gentleman not go to the navy yard and ask the question? There is nothing in this bill to prevent that being done, even if it passes as it is. I should like to have the Senator show me where in this bill there is any attempt to prevent anyone from asking for any information of anybody.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will undertake to answer that question.

I am a private citizen; I approach the Bureau of Navigation

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President-Mr. CUMMINS. Just a mome Just a moment; I will ask the Senator to wait until I get through. I approach the Bureau of Navigation, therefore I am approaching a place connected with the national defense, am I not? That is true, is it not? I am approaching it for the purpose of securing information connected with the national defense, namely, to take a picture of a battleip. Now, so far, I am surely within the terms of this bill. Mr. PITTMAN. I do not see anything about the Bureau of Navigation in the bill. That office is not mentioned.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Nevada say that the Bureau of Navigation is not included within the terms of this proposed law?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not say that it is not; but I do say that those places named in this provision are physical places, and the intent of the bill is plain, to prevent an individual from going upon these various works and places for the purpose of obtaining information to which he is not enfitled. The Senator can not refer to any provision in this bill where any individual is prevented from asking any information as to what act or question is lawful and as to what act or question is not lawful; and any such attempt in any bill would be absurd on the face of it, for the law encourages people to seek what the law is. One can go to the Attorney General's office and ask regarding the law. There is no attempt in this bill to prevent a person seeking such information; but if there is anything in this bill that denies anyone the privilege of asking what the law isand I do not think there is any such thing in the bill-I suggest that a proviso be put in to the effect that any person may ask anyone else with regard to whether or not he has a lawful right to do a certain act or seek certain information.

Mr. CUMMINS. I presume there is nothing in the bill that prevents anyone asking his neighbor what the law is. We have not gotten quite that far yet, although I expect to see that come in very soon, for I really think that this is the first step toward complete and utter silence and subjection in this country. But the Senator from Nevada has simply read the language, and he has answered himself, I think. I repeat, that if I approach a place named in this paragraph for the purpose of securing information, if that is in my mind, and if I am not entitled to that information then I become subject to the penalty prescribed by the act.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield. Mr. FALL. I think the difficulty is that the Senator would have to amend the law which has been in existence for six years if he wants to get away from this proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know as to that law, and my comment, so far as this paragraph is concerned, applies to it.

Mr. FALL. I was trying to call the attention of the Senator to that statute, so that we might possibly avoid further full discussion of it. If the Senator does not care to have me call his attention to it, or if I am interfering with the Senator in any way, of course, I will desist.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. FALL. The appetion according to the letter force with the senator in any content of the letter force with the le

Mr. FALL. The question asked in the letter from which the Senator read is answered by the law as it exists. As affecting that matter exactly the same law as the one now proposed, without the change of a word or a line or an expression or meaning, is in existence to-day. So that the Senator could answer his correspondent under the law of 1911, and not under this bill, for this bill does not change the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill, of course, is not the law yet, and I hope it may never become so.

Mr. OVERMAN. The law exists to-day, and yet the man who took the pictures for the newspaper has not been punished. That is the point I make.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I remarked an hour or two ago, this bill infinitely extends the places the approach to which would constitute a crime.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, the very fact, as I have said, that there is such a law in existence and the man who took the pictures for publication in the newspaper has not been punished shows to my mind what I have been contending for all the time, that if a man does an innocent act nobody is going to call him to account for it, and nobody is going to prosecute him, just as no one has prosecuted the Star for publishing the pictures referred to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is likely true, but that is the plea which every tyrant who ever oppressed humanity has made, I will not abuse the power. No matter what power I have, I will not use it against those who are not in some fashion or in some way guilty of a moral wrong." That is the argument that destroys democracy; that is the argument that annihilates institutions of our kind; and I am not willing to pass a law that comprehends thousands of innocent people and one guilty person simply because I may believe that the executive officers of the Government will not enforce it against the thousands of innocent people.

I have already said so much, however, about this expression "to which he is not lawfully entitled," that I care to say no more regarding it, but I desire now to address myself for a moment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh]. The objection which I have to that amendment-and I am very uncertain as to whether or not I can vote for it—is this: It presupposes that no private citizen, at least, has any right to go upon or approach any of these places, and that in order to do so he must have permission, either expressed or implied. I am not ready to admit the proposition that the citizens of this country have not an inherent right to do a great many of the things which are forbidden in this paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator. Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. A battleship is out in the harbor of San Francisco. The Senator would not insist that he has a perfect right to go out there and go aboard that battleship?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I would not; but I ask the Senator this

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark that sometimes the commander of a battleship is quite willing that visitors should come and look it over, and at other times he is quite unwilling that they should do so. Apparently, under the existing practice, at least, he is invested with complete authority to allow visitors to come aboard or to keep them off, as he sees fit; so that the amendment was framed by me in accordance with the notion that those who are put in charge of these places which are directly associated with the national defense are intrusted with the authority to allow them, under the rules that may be established, to be inspected and visited or to prohibit such inspection and visitation. That was the theory upon which the amendment was framed, I will say to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will ask the Senator from Montana a question. Suppose a citizen of my State lives near a temporary camp of the National Guard, where a company or regiment comes together once or twice a year for the purpose of training in military matters, and suppose that citizen-and these camps, of course, are not held within any inclosure—should approach the camp for the purpose of ascertaining whether the guardsmen were well drilled. I ask whether there is any law granting the citizen that permission?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should think that the commander of a military training camp would necessarily be invested with authority to exclude everybody from the confines

Mr. CUMMINS. How far would that authority extend? Must it extend to a point that would exclude human vision? The camps are held, of course, out on the prairie, and the ordinary custom is for the neighbors or the people in the community to gather around, sit on the fence, and see the soldiers

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me for just a moment, I should like to say that I hardly think the illustration he gives comes within the meaning or can be at all construed to come within the meaning of this bill. The places described in the act to which approach or entrance is forbidden are places owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States, or under the control of the United States, or of any of its officers or agents, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored under any contract or agreement with the United States, or with any person on behalf of the United States.

I can not conceive that that language would apply to a training camp at all,

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from South Dakota think that the National Guard is a part of the national defense?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it is a part of the national defense; but a visit to the National Guard in training is not included in the places to which a person is forbidden to go.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see whether it is or not. The language is:

To approach, go upon, enter, or fly over any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp—What does the word "camp" there mean?

Mr. STERLING. Well, if the Senator will read on, as I read it a little while ago, and get the connection, the places are described further down on that page.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the description read by the Senator from South Dakota applies to other things.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no-"or other place connected with the national defense, owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States." The implication is that this is a place connected with the national defense to which he must go, because the language is "or other place connected with the national defense'

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from South Dakota, it seems to me, is too partial in his view. He says, "Or under the control of the United States." Every camp of the National Guard is under the control of the United States, if the National Guard receives the compensation which is provided for in the law. There can not be any doubt but that a camp of the National Guard is one of the places that will be covered by this statute.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President-

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I am disposed to agree with the Senator from Iowa with respect to that matter, although I usually agree with the Senator from South Dakota about these matters. But it does occur to me, Mr. President, that I must answer the question of the Senator from Iowa as I did. If that is not covered by the law, it seems to me it certainly ought to be.

Mr. President, here is a camp in which an officer of the United States is engaged in drilling members of the militia in anticipation of immediate service. There might be military anticipation of immediate service. There might be military reasons of the most powerful and persuasive character why information should not get out concerning the particular line of tactics that are being pursued, the particular degree of proficiency to which the troops have attained, and all that kind of thing. It seems to me that it would be quite proper to vest in the officer in command of that camp the power to exclude the public while the training is going on.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought so, and therefore I offered the amendment which was voted down this morning; and I think the Senator from Montana was among the majority. I assume that the President could, by an order, exclude everybody from a camp of that kind; and if the emergency came that required any action of that sort, and he did it, then the whole world would know that it was contrary to the law to enter upon the camp or to approach the camp within a certain distance, and citizens could protect themselves. That was the very object I sought to accomplish in the amendment which I offered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President— Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon me for a moment, I was, as the Senator from Iowa says, with the majority, because I contemplated tendering this very amendment, and I preferred my own amendment to the amendment tendered by the Senator from Iowa—possibly an inexcusable vanity upon my part.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator that should the occasion arise, or should the time ever come when the President would exercise that power, it would suspend all laws that Congress might enact, and this law would not be necessary at all, would it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not grasp the question. Mr. VARDAMAN. I said, if the occasion should ever arise for the President to exercise the power, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, to make these proclamations, you would need no congressional enactment. The military law would suspend all civil law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It occurs to me that all of this legislation is for the purpose of meeting extreme cases, relying upon the benevolence of the military despot to mitigate its rigor in time of

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon the whole, Mr. President, I believe that the bill, as it is, is rather to be preferred than the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, for I think the inference that no citizen has any right in times of peace to approach any of these places without permission invades more grievously the privileges which I have thought a free country should enjoy than the language contained in the bill as it is reported.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if there is anything in this bill as it is now drawn, without his amendment, that would make a person guilty of any offense under the act for asking for information with regard to what was permissible thereunder?

Mr. WALSH. I know of nothing.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, if a person with good intent desired to obtain information with regard to the national defense, he would be on his guard, knowing that in times of these emergencies he should ask for information with regard to the law on the subject. The Senator from Montana gives it as his opinion, and I think that the lawyers here will all concur in it, that there is no crime in anyone asking anybody what is permissible under this bill and what is not permissible. Now, while it may impose a slight burden on a person to ask for information, it is much better to impose that burden upon a citizen than to permit espionage in this country with impunity.

The object of this paragraph, as I understand it, is not to keep people out of these yards, but it is to punish people for going into these yards for a certain unlawful purpose. I do not see anything in this bill that attempts to prevent people from going into these navy yards or on these battleships. We are not at war now, and, as the Senator from Iowa says, he would regret at this time to see a law passed which in times of peace would prevent the citizens of this country from visiting camps and possibly navy yards and shipbuilding yards. This bill does not attempt to do that. This bill does not attempt to keep people out of a certain place. The natural authority of the superinendent of these works will keep improper people out and will let proper people in. The object of this act is to punish spies. That is the object of the act. The object of the act is to punish a man gullty of a crime, and that crime consists in spying on this Government. Now, all of these amendments are directed to keeping people out and are not directed to the punishment of criminals, and therefore, if you adopt any of these amendments, you wipe out the punishment of criminals and simply provide a means for keeping certain people out or letting certain people in the places described.

I certainly insist that there is no hardship under this bill upon a person who desires information for legal purposes. There is only a hardship upon the person who is spying or attempting to spy upon our national defenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may not the amendment be stated? My impression is that Senators may have the idea that they are voting, in the first place, on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. I offered an amendment to that amendment, and I think it was hardly understood that we are voting upon that amendment. That is the amendment before

I ask that my amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh] as follows: After the word "permission" strike out the comma and the words "expressed or implied," so that it will read "without the permission of one lawfully entitled to give the same."

Mr. STERLING. It should read "without the expressed permission."

The Secretary. It is proposed to transpose the word "expressed" to come before the word "permission," so that it will read "without the expressed permission of one lawfully entitled to give the same."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Walsh]. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 2, 3, and 4, on page 10 of the proposed substitute, it is proposed to strike out the words "under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths," so that if amended it will read:

SECTION 1. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government, etc.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in the event this amendment prevails, I will offer another amendment striking out the word "affiant," which, of course, would be incorporated to which, of course, would be inappropriate if the amendment prevails, and substituting other words in place of that. But first, Mr. President, as to this particular amendment:

First, it seems to me that the requirement that the statement shall be made under oath really destroys the purposes of this act, or of this portion of the act. Now, the statement may be untrue; it may be willfully made, and it may, nevertheless, be very positively made, and be made with great detail, so that, though not sworn to, it will be very convincing in its effect, and therefore be just as detrimental to the interests and welfare of the Government as though it had been made under oath. I take it that few of these statements which are of injury to the Government relating to the military or payal operations of the Government relating to the military or naval operations of the Government or relating to our negotiations with foreign Governments in any dispute or controverysy that may arise between ours and a foreign Government are made under oath, and the parties making the statements would purposely avoid making them under oath; but their injurious effects would exist just the same as though they were made under oath.

Under the terms of the bill it will make no difference how positively the statement is made or how injurious might be its effect in the event of a prosecution for making the statement it would be an absolute defense, of course, whatever injury had been wrought, that the statement had not been made under oath; and I think the purpose of this act is to prevent statements, whether under oath or not, which will influence the measures or conduct of any foreign Government to the detriment of our own Government.

I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is the same language that is used in the Penal Code about other matters, and applies to a case like that of the man who, on the occasion of the sinking of the Lusitania, made an affidavit to the effect that that vessel was armed when it was not armed, and they could not convict him of perjury. He just simply made a sworn statement. It was not sworn to in any court.

Mr. STERLING. There the offense charged, of course, was perjury for making a statement under eath that the Lusitunia was an armed vessel. That was the statement made. This That was the statement made. This relates to a somewhat different situation, and relates to any statements that are made prejudicial to the Government in its dealings with foreign Governments. All that a party need do, of course, in order to avoid punishment for any statement, however detrimental to the Government, would be to avoid making the statement under oath. The influence would be the same, and he would have perfect immunity from punishment for making such a statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that would be a little too drastic and carrying it too far. Where a man makes a false statement in writing under oath, he ought to be indicted for perjury and convicted, but in the case of simply ordinary conversation I doubt whether we ought to go that far.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will recall the other language of the bill, the statement, of course, must be willfully made and knowingly made, with the intent, of course, to hinder the Government in its dealings with foreign Governments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Daketa a question?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think it is ever allowable to tell a falsehood in order to benefit one's country?

Mr. STERLING. It may be.
Mr. CUMMINS. Well, this would make it criminal.
Mr. STERLING. No; if the Senator will permit me, I propose to offer another amendment that will cover that proposition. It is a delicate question, I will say to the Senator, as to whether he may or not; but I think the statement made should not be made to the detriment of the Government of the United States, and I propose to offer that amendment in case this amendment

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose, however, that the Senator's first amendment was adopted and his latter amendment was not. If it is ever permissible to tell a falsehood in order to save your country, you ought not to make the man a criminal who would do it. Aside from that—
Mr. STERLING. The effect is just the same, I will say to the Senator, so far as that is concerned, whether made under oath or whether not made under oath.
